Honourable senators, my remarks have been quite negative on this matter because I feel quite negative about the program. In many ways, I think it is wrong in principle, and I think it is apt to be ineffective in practice. I say that again while adding that I do not question the good intentions of those who designed the program. Like any program, and more so than most, I suspect, regional disparity programs must be analyzed to make sure that they are going to advance the objectives that are claimed for them. We know there is little enough money available for that field of government policy. The DREE budget is now somewhat less than one per cent of the total federal budget. So, everyone wants to get value from the incentives available, including the so-called tax expenditures. While there is a pretty fair consensus in this country, particularly on the part of the richer governments, traditionally Ontario and now Alberta, in favour of attacking regional disparities, I do not think anyone would suggest that there is an overwhelming demand for regional disparity programs in the country at large. So, we have to be careful, I think, in making sure that the programs that we do design and execute are effective and are seen to be effective.

Personally, I would prefer to see this program dropped and replaced by something else, something closer to the Crosbie program, which I believe is a proper regional disparity program, as such. I would suggest that some program be devised that attacks regional disparities alone, and not one that tries to attack regional disparities, northern development, isolated areas, native opportunities and intraprovincial disparities all at the same time. I do not think that can be done with a program of this kind.

Certainly, I would suggest that the rule that DREE has imposed—that the program must be limited to 40 per cent of the population of a given province—should be eliminated. Indeed, I suggest that if the unemployment and per capita income criteria were to be adjusted somewhat, they would include, as they should include, the entire Atlantic region and the Gaspé.

Failing that, I simply wish to make the point that some body—perhaps the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance—should keep a critical eye on this program over the next year or so and call the government, the minister and his officials to account for it as time goes on.

I thank honourable senators for their attention on this matter. Some other honourable senator may wish to express his or her views on this subject at a future date. In any event, my remarks are on the record. I hope that, at the very least, my remarks will serve to generate some interest on the part of honourable senators so that they will keep an eye on this program as time goes on.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Murray a question for the event that I may, as I probably will, adjourn this inquiry? Of course, I will be interested in looking into the indictment part of his observations to see if there are answers to that. But I should also like to understand more clearly what might be called the "Murray plan." The MacEachen-De Bané plan has not pleased him, for reasons he has put forward. He has said that the Crosbie plan was imperfect but preferable. Could he tell me how he would supplement the Crosbie plan to make it closer to what he would be prepared to support, so that I may include that in any remarks I make, or so that it may be included in the remarks anyone else wishes to make on the subject of this inquiry?

Senator Murray: Well, honourable senators, as I indicated, my fundamental objection to the MacEachen-De Bané plan is that it carves up part of the provinces and regions, such as the Atlantic provinces, that, themselves, as provinces and regions, suffer from regional disparities. I believe that a more effective attack on regional disparities, as such, would not eliminate parts of the Atlantic provinces but would include that entire region.

I quite agree that in the case of a large province, such as the province of Quebec, there is ample justification for targeting a program to a particular region, for example, the Gaspé region, and for other parts of that province to have particular programs directed, as they are, at the Montreal region or at the western Quebec region. I would certainly like to see the Atlantic provinces left intact in any such program.

Senator Frith: As they were in the Crosbie plan?

Senator Murray: As they were in the Crosbie plan. I would suggest that other programs be developed to attack the particular problems of northern Ontario or of the northern parts of the other provinces, or the problem of native unemployment. I do not think that those are problems that can be attacked effectively in a program purporting to attack regional disparities.

Senator Frith: Would you add anything more to the Crosbie plan?

Senator Murray: There might be a great deal more that I would add to the Crosbie plan. Perhaps an opportunity will occur for me to think about that and to enlighten the Deputy Leader of the Government and other honourable senators on that. I certainly do not claim for a moment that the Crosbie plan—which was to be a supplement to all other existing regional incentive programs—would have been the last word in regional disparity programs. I think we are all agreed that this is a problem that has been almost chronic and that will be with us for some time.

So, I do not claim that the Crosbie program was the last word. I would certainly be willing to entertain new programs, some of which were contained in the platform of our party, though I need not go into that now. I would be willing to support other new programs to attack regional disparities, as I said.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Douglas D. Everett, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report:

February 12, 1981

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, to which was referred Bill C-24, "An Act to amend laws relating to fiscal transfers to the provinces", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Wednesday, February 11, 1981, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

D. D. Everett,
(Chairman)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Everett moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Friday, February 13, 1981 at 11 o'clock in the morning.

Honourable senators—

Senator Asselin: Explain.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The motion has to be put first, and, as a matter of fact, I am not prepared to give leave at this time, although I may be prepared to do so later. I have not had time to discuss this matter with the deputy leader, but it seems to me that we should have some discussion before leave is granted.

It may be that we will eventually give leave, but if there are other arrangements that would be satisfactory to the government and to honourable senators generally—and I am more worried about senators generally than the government—it may be that the Senate could adjourn until Tuesday next.

I would ask that this motion be kept in abeyance, and the deputy leader may ask for leave later this afternoon.

Senator Frith: I should like to explain why I am asking leave to adjourn until tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock, since we are now speaking to that question.

I understand the concern of the Leader of the Opposition, and I regret that, although I did talk to him a couple of times earlier today, I was not able to tell him about this most recent development. Therefore, as he says, we have not had a chance to discuss this matter, so I want to explain why I am asking for leave to sit tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The information I have is that the committee will make its report tomorrow, in accordance with the deadline set for it. That report will be tabled in the House of Commons at about noon—and I am just giving you my best estimate, although I think it is a good guess. Then there is the strong possibility that, pursuant to the committee's report and for other reasons that seem proper to it, the government will move a resolution for an Address to Her Majesty, because it is anticipated that will be the recommendation of the committee, and the government intends to proceed in that way.

Honourable senators, on that basis, the report of the committee on this important issue could be ready to be presented at a time when the Senate is not in session. I leave aside the question of whether or not it is technically and legally necessary that the Senate be sitting. There are differences of opinion on that. In the final analysis, I doubt very much that one could make an absolute case for saying that it is necessary that the Senate be in session to legally receive the report. Whether or not it is legally necessary is not the question. I feel that it is very desirable that the report on this important question be received by the Senate, and that the Senate be available to receive it when it is ready to be presented. It is very likely that at the same time the government will present in the other place a resolution for an Address to Her Majesty on this important question, and I think it undesirable too that the Senate not be here if the government proceeds in that manner—that is, on a concurrent basis.

If leave is not granted to meet tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock, then, according to our rules, we will meet at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. If that is what honourable senators prefer, that is all right. However, I believe that we should sit at 11 o'clock so that we can take the steps necessary for tabling or receiving the report. If the government is then going to propose this concurrent resolution for an Address to Her Majesty, we can also prepare to give notice of that tomorrow morning. If honourable senators prefer to sit in the afternoon, that will be the result if leave is not granted.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I heard the discussion on this matter yesterday, to the effect that this is a rather unique thing to come before the Senate. However, it is a report from a joint committee. I probably do not appreciate the urgency of this matter, but I think the procedure is rather unusual, if not unique. I am not opposed to it, but I would not want it to become a precedent of this chamber until we have had further discussion or until I, personally, have become better acquainted with the rules. I am prepared to be present tomorrow, but I am not sure that it is necessary that we meet promptly at the time a joint committee makes its report. Perhaps those who know more than I do have come to the conclusion that we should be here tomorrow and for some reason, perhaps of necessity or urgency, rapidly adopt the joint committee report. If we are being asked to give unanimous consent, I do not object; I will be present tomorrow. However, I want it to be clearly understood that the debate on the joint committee report will be wide open. I am even willing to agree to a five-day week. I do not object to that at all. My only point is that I do not want it to be regarded as a precedent that a joint committee report requires consideration by this chamber on the very day it is received by us. We run our own affairs. I am in agreement that it be dealt with tomorrow, but I do not want that to be taken as a precedent to be noted in Bourinot or Beauchesne.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator Benidickson has made a point which should be obvious to us all. We do not have to be here tomorrow, and the only reason the deputy leader has requested our attendance tomorrow is to receive the report.

Senator Frith: That is not the only reason.

Senator Flynn: I will come to that. He has not indicated that the government has made up its mind to present a resolution based on the report. If that is the case, I can deal with it eventually.

What I am suggesting is that we do not have to sit tomorrow, because the report can be received by the other place and we do not have to receive it on the same day. But we could agree to give permission to the committee to publish its report, just as we have done regarding our own committees; or, alternatively, we could agree that the report be deemed to have been received by the Senate tomorrow. We, on this side, are prepared to give that undertaking, if that is the only reason for sitting tomorrow.

The second point I want to make has to do with the Leader of the Government's giving notice that tomorrow the government will move a resolution based on the report. We, on this side, are prepared to waive the two days' notice so that the motion can be moved on Tuesday, if that would meet with the agreement of the government. Again, I am speaking of the government, because I know the sentiments of certain senators on the other side. They do not necessarily agree with the instructions that come from higher up.

You can smile more than that, Senator Stanbury. Don't be shy.

We could agree to that, and that is the reason why I wanted to confer with Senator Frith before he moves that motion. The only reservation we have is with regard to proceeding at the same time as the House of Commons to consider that resolution.

Senator Benidickson: Yes.

Senator Flynn: I have several reservations about that, and I believe some senators on your side have some as well. My proposal would be, first, to give leave to the joint committee to publish its report tomorrow. Next, we waive the two days' notice as far as the presentation of a resolution based on the report is concerned, but on the condition that the first Order of the Day be a motion moved by us that the Senate not take this resolution into consideration before the House of Commons has completed its consideration of the resolution. We would have a debate of one or two days' duration on that motion, and if the majority says we are going to proceed concurrently with the House of Commons, then there is nothing we can do about it. That would be the decision of the Senate, and we would have no choice. It would be a more reasonable way of doing things.

It seems to me that the government should not be quite as concerned about the way in which we should proceed on this problem. The Senate should be in a position that allows it to debate as wisely as possible in the proper context and with the proper decorum. That is why I suggest to the Deputy Leader of the Government that we should wait until later today after we have had a chance to discuss it along the lines I have indicated. There may be some refinements to my proposal. If there is an agreement, all the better; but if there is no agreement, then we on this side will do what we can to try to prove that the Senate is not a rubber stamp of the government.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, let us be clear about what is before us at this moment. It is a request for leave to move that we sit tomorrow at 11 a.m. If leave is not granted, and it is left at that, we shall sit tomorrow at 2 p.m. Let it be understood that I am not asking for leave to sit tomorrow at 2 p.m. That would take place automatically. The leave that I am asking for is leave to move that we sit tomorrow at 11 a.m. instead of 2 p.m.

I understand the concern of the Leader of the Opposition about the concurrent procedure. There are advantages and disadvantages to such a procedure, and there are advantages and disadvantages to the consecutive procedure. It seems clear that in this case the government will decide to proceed on a concurrent basis. If that is so, it would appear to me to be highly desirable that senators be here to commence dealing with the matter at roughly the same time or, at least, on the same day that members of the other place begin dealing with it.

On the question of leave to proceed on Tuesday, if notice of a resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty is given tomorrow, it would normally be moved on Tuesday—

Senator Flynn: That's right.

Senator Frith: —because it needs two days' notice, and there must be a sitting day in between.

On the question of debating whether or not the government should proceed concurrently, in my view it is not desirable for us to do that because the government intends to proceed concurrently if it is going to proceed with that separate resolution.

Senator Flynn: Oh no.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, on a point of order, we are now being told—

Senator Flynn: That is not what you said—

Senator Frith: I said the government intends to proceed—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order.

Senator Grosart: Surely the Deputy Leader of the Government will recognize our rules at least to the extent that when a senator rises on a point of order, he has the floor.

Senator Frith: Yes, certainly.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps I should point out to the deputy leader that the leave for which he asked was to move a motion. Leave was not granted. Nevertheless, he has proceeded to debate the motion.

Senator Frith: I thought we had both decided that we wanted to discuss it. I will be glad to drop the whole thing.

Senator Grosart: Leave was not granted to move the motion to discuss it. That is the present situation. I now ask the following question: Is it the intention of the government to introduce a motion which would implement a possible recommendation of a committee which will present its report to this house before that report has been discussed or concurred in? Assuming there is a certain recommendation in that report, is it the intention to move a resolution based on that supposed possible, potential—

Senator Molgat: That is not a point of order; it is a question.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator raised a point of order. He should not ask a question, and he should sit down after disposing of the point of order.

● (1420)

Senator Molgat: There is no point of order.

Senator Grosart: His Honour will decide.

The Hon. the Speaker: I think the first point of order relates to whether leave is or is not granted. If leave is not granted, that is all there is to it; there is no discussion on that point.

Do you maintain your position, Honourable Leader of the Opposition?

Senator Flynn: If you remain standing, I will sit down.

The Hon. the Speaker: I do not want another speech. I want to know if you grant leave.

Senator Flynn: If you want an explanation, give me the opportunity to make it.

I have been trying to discuss this matter of leave. I think we can always debate whether leave should be granted or not, but if you say, Mr. Speaker, that we cannot debate that matter, then I am going to sit down. I have not given leave, however.

I was prepared to see whether later on we might give leave, and that is what I was proposing to the deputy leader, namely, that he postpone his motion to a later time today; but if not, then so be it.

Senator Frith: I can do that. Honourable senators, I see no difficulty, because we can always, with consent, revert to Notices of Motions. At the moment let us assume that with regard to this motion leave has not been granted. We will try to confer about it. If we agree on something and want to give a notice of motion we can revert to Notices of Motions and deal with it at that time.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Monday, if we come back on Monday, I will move that the Senate not consider approval of the report of the Joint Committee on the Constitution, or any resolution based thereon, before the House of Commons has disposed of the same.

This is a notice of motion. That is all. I will style it more elegantly later.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

GRAIN

CROWSNEST RATES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was looking forward to having the opportunity of asking a question of the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, but I see he is not here. I suppose I can proceed with my inquiry anyway, and no doubt he will furnish me with an answer in due course.

I am looking for some guidance from him as I try to find my way through the labyrinth of government policy in connection with the Crow rate, because last night the minister made a very clear statement on the radio to the effect that he had no intention of recommending any change in the Crow to the cabinet. I linked that with his statement of the other day that he thought any negotiations on the Crow should be conducted in secret.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Until the producers support that action.

Senator Roblin: Well, I do not care how you modify it. He was going to have a secret meeting.

Senator Olson: That is not quite right.

Senator Roblin: I do not think I am misrepresenting the matter.

Senator Olson: I am just suggesting that you have taken his remarks out of context.

Senator Asselin: Don't be nervous.

Senator Olson: I am not nervous.

Senator Roblin: Senator Olson has perfect confidence in his colleague; I know that.

The point that puzzles me is that prior to that, at the end of last year, the Minister of Transport warned that there would be rationing on the railway system in western Canada in a few years' time—I think he said in 1983—unless something was done. Then he again is quoted in House of Commons Debates as having had the opinion that whatever would be done would be done openly; a resolution would be sought openly and in consultation with most of those concerned. Incidentally, I think that is quite a good idea.

● (1425)

Then the Minister of Agriculture, speaking on the same subject in the House of Commons on another occasion, made it quite clear that in his opinion something would be done about the Crow rate. I quote from Commons Hansard of December 9, at page 5552, and this is the Minister of Agriculture speaking:

> I did not say it should not be touched or changed. It should be changed.

We have three different matters at issue here: whether the Crow should be changed; whether the change should be in secret; and whether it should be changed in time to deal with the anticipated rationing situation on the railway.

My question is: Who is speaking? What minister is charged with the responsibility, on the part of the government, in making statements with respect to the Crow?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, if the question is directed to me, clearly all the ministers who have been making statements are charged with the responsibility of agriculture, and this, of course, includes the agricultural producers who are involved. Some of the allegations—if that is the right word—in the quotes that have been made are those that put in certain pieces and leave out certain pieces.

Of course, the minister responsible for the Wheat Board—and he will be back in a few minutes and can speak for himself—has said that, as far as he is concerned, the government is reluctant to move until there is great support by the producers who will be affected. There is no question about that.

We also know that the Minister of Transport expressed some concern respecting certain statements that have been made about increases in the capacity of at least the southern delivery system to the west coast unless there are some changes made to the Crow rate.

I can tell my honourable friend opposite that we dismiss that kind of allegation rather quickly because it attempts to relate two things that ought not to be related. I do not think there is any great contradiction in all those statements, although my friend is trying desperately to indicate that there is.

Senator Roblin: Well, my friend does not answer the question, because surely three ministers saying essentially two or three different things cannot be speaking with the same voice, with the same responsibility and for the same government. Who is speaking for the government in this matter? The three ministers make statements on the subject which certainly contradict each other. I think people interested in the Crow have a right to know what the real policy of the government is.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my friend will know that there has been some very significant movement, if that is the right word, in the attitude of the representatives of the producers in western Canada through such things as the Western Conference. What is also clear is that some of those organizations which subscribe to what the Western Conference has recommended to the government have also issued separate and independent positions which, in our interpretation, vary considerably from what was supposedly contained in the recommendations from the Western Conference. Therefore, we not only need to know where those views will be reconciled but also how large the support of the membership of the organizations is in relation to what has been put into and has come out of the Western Conference. If my honourable friend is unaware of that, he simply has not been following the situation quite as precisely as he ought to have been.

Senator Roblin: Of course, I am well aware of the situation. I know what the minister says is quite true, that there is a difference of opinion and that the Western Conference has one point of view and the Farmers' Union has another. Sometimes we do not know where the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool stands, and the livestock people have an input into this as well. I am not pretending it is a simple policy, nor am I pretending that the minister is wrong in trying to seek agreement among the people affected; I do not think he is wrong. However, I think he is wrong to make statements which foreclose the issue. Last night on the radio the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board said that he would not recommend to the cabinet any change in the Crow. Well, if that does not at least in part foreclose the issue without any agreement with those concerned having been reached, I don't know what does. My complaint is that I wish my honourable friend would get busy with co-ordinating the producers, if that is what he wants to do, and stop issuing these statements which have the appearance of the form but not the substance of government policy.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there is obviously a disagreement on the interpretation in the contexts of certain things involved in this. For example, I would be rather surprised if my honourable friend opposite were to claim that what he might have heard on the radio constitutes the total expression of opinion by the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. If he is unwilling to accept all of the other statements and put them in context relative to the Crow, I am not sure what we can do about that. But there is much more to the position taken by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board than what the honourable senator might have heard on the radio last night.

Senator Roblin: Then I wish he would explain himself.

Senator Olson: That has been done.

Senator Roblin: Then it has not been explained well, because this morning the news report on the CBC—which is not myself quoting the minister but is the CBC summarizing his statement—was that Senator Hazen Argue, the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, had stated that he was opposed to any re-opening of the issue of the Crowsnest Pass rate. The CBC news goes out over the whole country, and people believe what they hear on the CBC.

Senator Olson: But that is not all.

Senator Roblin: If that is not correct, then I want my honourable friend to say what is correct. If that statement does not mean what it appears to mean on the face of it, then I want the minister of state who made the statement to tell us what it does mean.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I see no purpose in continuing this discussion or in engaging in these questions and answers with the honourable senator. The minister has been invited to make a full and complete statement, and I am sure he will be happy to take 40, 60 or 80 minutes, or whatever time it requires, to do that at the appropriate time.

Senator Perrault: What you have been hearing are just fragmentary news reports.

Senator Godfrey: The minister has just arrived.

Senator Roblin: No doubt the minister will answer my questions tomorrow, after he has read what has been said today.

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM

LETTER FROM MR. TOM SIDDON, M.P.

Hon. Peter Bosa: I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I recently received a letter from Mr. Tom Siddon, M.P., Richmond-South Delta, which states in part:

> I think you would want to know that the Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau is receiving thousands of letters similar in form to those attached. There is a genuine feeling, especially in Western Canada, that his unilateral approach to Constitutional Reform is in fact unconstitutional.

Can the leader tell us whether it is a correct interpretation to say that the Prime Minister's approach is unilateral when, in fact, the Prime Minister has the support of the federal New Democratic Party, which has two dozen members out west, has the support of the Premier of New Brunswick, who is of Conservative political persuasion, has the support of the Premier of Ontario, the most populous province in Canada, and has, as well, the support of Mr. Bill Yurko, the Conservative Member of Parliament for Edmonton East, who, I am sure, has the support of tens of thousands of people out west? How could anyone describe that as a unilateral approach?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, obviously the honourable senator has a firm grasp of the facts.

ENERGY

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL PRICING NEGOTIATIONS—REPRESENTATIONS BY CANADIAN FEDERATION OF INDEPENDENT BUSINESS

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. I noted that earlier this week the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources blamed Alberta for the fact that high-level energy pricing negotiations had not yet begun. Can the minister indicate whether his government is prepared to be flexible on price, if the negotiations resume?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): That has already been stated a number of times, honourable senators.

Senator Donahoe: According to my understanding of what the minister has just replied, his government has fixed a price which, by its nature, is flexible and may be increased. I believe that was implicit in his answer.

May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of State for Economic Development? Subsequent to his meeting on Tuesday with John Bulloch of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is reported in the press as saying that it was "certainly an erroneous impression" if anyone thought he was going to offer Alberta higher prices.

When the government is, in advance in that way, closing the door on the prospect of fruitful negotiations in which, presumably, the federal government would have to demonstrate its willingness to compromise, is the minister responsible for economic development at all surprised that Alberta declines to participate?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we could go and dig out any number of quotations from Hansard of the other place, but my honourable friend can do that just as easily as I; he can do his own homework. If he wants to see what the minister has said about an attempt to re-open the negotiations with Alberta, it is all there, laid out quite clearly in black and white. As I have said, he can do his homework just as easily as I can do it for him.

REPRESENTATIONS OF CANADIAN FEDERATION OF INDEPENDENT BUSINESS

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: I have a further supplementary question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Is the minister aware of the representations made to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on Tuesday by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, which happened to include the view of 69 per cent of the respondents to its internal poll that Canadian oil prices should move more rapidly to 75 per cent of the world level? Is it the intention of the government to dismiss the views of small businessmen, as it did those expressed by the banking and pulp and paper industries?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No, honourable senators, it is not the intention of the government to dismiss the views of the members of that important sector of our economy.

To answer the first part of the honourable senator's question, no, I am not directly aware of the representations made to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources within the last day or two, but I will ask for a report on that and then I will be aware of the situation.

Senator Donahoe: Good. You will find it informative.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to the meeting that was held between Mr. MacGuigan, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and his American counterpart. Obviously, we are all pleased that that visit could take place so soon after the appointment of the new United States Secretary of State.

Prior to that visit the indication was that certain items were to be discussed, including, in particular, the fisheries treaty, but among the other items to be discussed was the matter of the Garrison Dam.

I should like to quote from the French text of a press story, if I may:

[Translation]

> —intends as well to raise the matter of the Garrison Diversion project, in North Dakota. Among other things, he would like to get assurances from the United States that nothing will be done which might spread pollutants in Manitoba's waters.

[English]

This is my question: Was this matter actually discussed, because in addition to its immediate concern for Manitoba, it has a much wider concern with respect to the whole matter of international waters between ourselves and the United States? Was it discussed, and what assurances do we have from the new Secretary of State in that respect?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to thank my honourable friend for that important question. It is my understanding that there was in fact a discussion of the Garrison situation at the meeting between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the United States Secretary of State, General Haig. However, I understand that no decisions have yet been made as a result of those conversations.

I have further information relating to Garrison. The U.S. Department of State has requested that a process of bilateral consultations regarding the Garrison diversion be initiated in March. As a prelude to these consultations, Canadian scientific and technical experts, on January 21, 22 and 23, visited the Water and Power Resources Service Engineering Research Center in Colorado to receive a briefing on the possible project design modifications. This technical review will provide us with a basis on which to proceed in the consultation process, keeping in mind Canada's firm position that any inter-basin transfer water is unacceptable.

Honourable senators, as far as the meeting between the new American Secretary of State and the Secretary of State for External Affairs is concerned, the agenda items included these other matters: The long delayed East Coast Fisheries and Boundaries Treaty; environmental issues such as acid rain; extraterritoriality; the auto pact; an exchange on east-west and north-south matters, particularly in light of the forthcoming Ottawa Economic Summit; and a review of events in other regions of the world such as the Caribbean, southern Africa, and the Middle East.

Certainly, an inquiry will go forward to the department to determine whether any additional material is available with respect to Garrison.

EAST COAST FISHERIES AND MARITIME BOUNDARY TREATIES

Hon. Martial Asselin: I have a supplementary. Is it true that at the meeting between the two Secretaries of State, Mr. MacGuigan did not receive from his American counterpart the assurance that the U.S. Senate was ready to sign the fishing rights treaty?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no detailed information available on that matter and for that reason the question will be taken as notice.

Senator Asselin: Will you make an inquiry of the minister?

Senator Perrault: Yes. The question will be taken as notice.

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is supplementary to those raised concerning the Garrison. At some time in January a group of Canadian scientists went to the United States to join with their counterparts to discuss the various aspects of the Garrison. I believe the minister referred to it in his statement.

Has a report of that meeting been issued? If so, I would appreciate having a copy. If no report has been issued, is it the intention that one be issued?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that question must be taken as notice.

I do have some late, additional information regarding the Garrison that I can add to the previous information. The U.S. Secretary of the Interior has agreed to place the funds associated with those aspects of the Garrison project that might affect Canada in a so-called "reserve fund" pending completion of consultation with Canada.

We have now been informed that the U.S. Office of Management and Budget has rejected this proposal. The Department of the Interior assures us, however, that the funds will be spent only on the West Oaks test area, work which involves no effects on Canada.

However, I do not have a report from the committee to which the honourable senator is referring.

Senator Roblin: You will check into it for me?

Senator Perrault: Yes.

NATIONAL REVENUE

CHILD TAX CREDIT

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I should like to address my question to the Leader of the Government. Last month 3.6 million families across Canada received, along with their family allowances, a slip indicating the requirement to make application for the child tax credit for the coming year, and we know that 2.6 million parents qualified for this tax credit last year.

However, we are also aware that a number of children do not receive the tax credit benefit because of the inability of the mother to receive co-operation from the father in signing the application because it would disclose his income to his wife. I note that there are no statistics on this matter.

Surely some sort of cross-reference system could be initiated which would not expose the confidentiality of the husband's income. By such cross-reference we could also obtain statistics concerning those who are not receiving the tax credit because of the inability of the mother to acquire the husband's signature. In Britain, for example, it is suggested that between one in three and one in six husbands refuse to sign a somewhat similar application.

I would ask the Leader of the Government to inform the house what the Minister of National Revenue proposes to do to overcome this log jam which results from the husbands' refusal to sign. The husband's signature on that form ensures that the mother does receive the tax benefit which, in turn, benefits the children.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Thompson for that important question, and for the positive suggestion he has made. The information will be sought and provided as quickly as possible. Furthermore, his idea will be passed along to the appropriate ministry.

ENERGY

STRAIT OF CANSO—POTENTIAL SITE OF NATURAL GAS LIQUEFACTION TERMINAL

Hon. Robert Muir: My question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development and concerns a very disturbing situation.

Yesterday in the other place, Mr. Rosaire Gendron, the member for Kamouraska-Rivière-du-Loup, quoted a Canadian Press item as follows:

> The federal Minister of the Environment, John Roberts, announced yesterday that the Canso Straight area—

Of course, our Hansard reporters are brilliant enough to know that that word is spelled S-t-r-a-i-t.

> —had been rejected as a possible site for a natural gas liquefaction terminal.

In his reply—after explaining in great detail that he really did know the difference between New Brunswick and Nova Scotia—the Honourable John Roberts tried to explain the situation by saying:

> There has been no change in the situation. The site at Gros Cacouna and the site in Nova Scotia are both under the process of environmental review undertaken in each case by the province with the participation and co-operation of the federal government.

I would ask the honourable gentleman who is in charge of economic development—and God knows we need economic development on the east coast—if he would advise us when the National Energy Board will be in a position to provide a report as to whether the Strait of Canso will even be considered as compared with Gros Cacouna, and, if so, how soon will that take place. He may be able to contact the board and receive some advice.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I will take the question as notice and try to obtain the information.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—EFFECT ON DOME PETROLEUM LIMITED

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development and it concerns the latest example of Mr. Lalonde's energy program in action. Will the minister confirm that the situation with regard to Dome Petroleum under the Lalonde energy program will be as follows: That Dome Petroleum, which is now approximately 30 per cent Canadian owned, will create a new subsidiary, Dome Canada Limited, of which the parent, Dome Petroleum, will own 45 per cent; that Dome Petroleum will attain its 45 per cent interest by turning over to Dome Canada Limited $250 million worth of shares in TransCanada PipeLine, of which Dome Petroleum now owns 48 per cent; that Dome Canada Limited will attain a 50 per cent interest in Dome Petroleum's acreage by borrowing $225 million from Japan's national oil company, and by issuing about $400 million worth of shares on the Canadian market; that Dome Canada Limited will pay all of the parent's Canadian exploration expenses on both federal and provincial lands in return for this 50 per cent interest; and, when all the smoke has cleared from this magic, that there will be a paper company—managed by the parent, Dome Petroleum, with the parent's senior officers as the majority of the board of directors—eligible for special grants from the taxpayer to finance exploration.

Will the minister explain what all of this will do for energy self-sufficiency or for the Canadian economy?

● (1450)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the complexities of what is involved in this deal I do not think have been fully explained by what my honourable friend has just stated. He is like his colleagues. He leaves out certain parts that are important—that is, the totality of the exploration budget of the companies involved, such as Dome Canada, Dome Petroleum and so forth. They will go up by 50 per cent. He did not mention that at all.

If my honourable friend wishes to dig deeper, he will see that there is a transition period also involved. All of this is important in making sure that the beneficial ownership in the end result winds up in the hands of Canadians at the levels that are indicated. Of course, he did not indicate that either.

I am sure that as he goes through his examination of oil company activities, whether it be Dome, Petro-Canada, or any one of the others, he will find that there are complex arrangements made between oil companies to share the risk of exploration, development and bringing the product to the delivery system. All of these are extremely expensive.

My honourable friend could keep himself occupied for a long while if he wants to sort out not only what has happened in this case, but the complexities of what has happened in the past.

Senator Flynn: You are, on the answer.

Senator Murray: What is it doing for Canada?

Senator Roblin: It is doing a lot for Dome Petroleum.

Senator Olson: They are Canadians.

EDUCATION

FEDERAL GRANTS TO POST-SECONDARY INSTITUTIONS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, if the front bench contretemps has ended, I shall be delighted to put a question. I always like to ask questions of the Leader of the Government, especially questions on education, since some weeks ago I followed him at the Vernon Campus of Okanagan College. The students were unanimous in saying that they had no idea the Senate was such a lively place until they had heard from Senators Perrault and Macquarrie. We want to keep that up!

[Senator Murray.]

I should like to ask the leader—I will not exhaust the totality of my interest in education, to use Senator Olson's obviously patented word—whether he has anything further to relate to me and other honourable members of the Senate on the serious matter I raised the other day with respect to the concern that the leaders of Canadian universities have with respect to a particular problem which has been presented to them.

There is further reason for anguish—and I present this to him as a long time friend—having heard that the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council has not yet been told what its budget is for 1981-82, and that they are having great difficulty in planning their future research, an area which is of the utmost concern to a country such as ours which must prosper in technological advances. Incidentally, implicit in this, and in the foreground, is the loss of perhaps 2,000 jobs.

In case the minister asks for the source of my information, I will refer him to an article written by Margaret Munro, educational writer, which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of February 7 last.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question of financial support for higher education in this country is of real concern to all of the provinces and the national government. During the past week, I met personally with the presidents of three of Canada's universities. They expressed their apprehension and concern regarding the future of university funding.

With the honourable senator's background in higher education, I believe he is aware of the fact that at least in some provinces there has been a substantial increase in the amount of federal funding for higher education in recent years, with the federal government assuming a greater and greater percentage of the support of higher education.

The federal government has concerns about the ultimate cost and budgetary implications. Additionally, in some of the provinces where there is a trend toward a greater percentage of federal financing in higher education there are budgetary surpluses. The federal government, of course, has a substantial deficit.

There is no intention on the part of the federal government to abandon higher education in this country. I think it can be said that a majority of Canadians want their taxes to be deployed in an effective and efficient manner. They want to reduce waste as much as possible, and they want to make sure that every program which receives taxpayers' funds has been properly established and they want to make sure that there is a fair balance between the contributions of the two senior levels of government.

I would be pleased to bring a statement to the Senate on this entire subject. We will know later this month, of course, some of the details of the budget proposals when the estimates become available for consideration and study. As I said, I shall be pleased to bring further information to the Senate on this subject.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, by way of a preamble to a rare supplementary, I am not one who knocks what the federal government has already done over many, many years, and neither am I one who exonerates the provincial governments on all of these matters, but we are reaching another aspect. Important educational authorities are having difficulty planning their vital operations because they cannot find out from the federal government what, in fact, is the financial commitment for the upcoming year. I would ask the leader to apply himself to that important aspect of the matter. I know a little about educational administration and know that it is difficult at best, and these are not the best of times, by any means.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this is an important subject, and I understand the implications of it. As I have said, these same concerns were expressed to me by the presidents of three of our institutes of higher learning in meetings which I had with them this week. Certainly, it is difficult in any field of endeavour to try to proceed without knowing what the budget is going to be.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, my question is supplementary to the one posed by my brilliant and learned friend, Senator Macquarrie. I know this subject is very dear to his heart. I know the government leader is also interested in it, and am I not correct in pointing out that just a few days ago he said that there would be no cutbacks in higher education in this country? Did he not say that to the universities?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I cannot recall a statement of that kind made by me. The whole matter of finance for higher education and other worthwhile endeavours is under review. I do not believe I made a suggestion that all things would remain as they are.

Senator Muir: I trust that you will soon be making that statement.

Senator Olson: That is anticipatory.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, is it not a fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has excluded the possibility of any cuts being made in other programs that come under Established Programs Financing, such as medicare, the hospital plan and so forth? The possibility of cuts in those programs has been excluded by the government leader's colleague, Madame Bégin, and the only conclusion or inference one can draw from that is that if cuts are coming, they are coming in the area of post-secondary education. Is that not correct?

● (1500)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, at the present time there are a number of cost-sharing programs being discussed with the provinces, such as Royal Canadian Mounted Police services in the provinces, hospital services, medical services and higher education. Surely the honourable senator, whose party talked in terms of a need to reduce government spending and the funding for certain services in the country, cannot object to this thoughtful approach by the present government to determine the efficiency of programs and whether or not a proper balance has been established between provincial and federal funding for those programs. The honourable senator should be—

Senator Asselin: That is a funny statement.

Senator Perrault: —most enthusiastic in view of the support he gave in the last federal election compaign to his mentor, Mr. Clark, on this whole issue of government spending.

It should be borne in mind, honourable senators, that allegations have increasingly and disturbingly been made that where the federal government has provided increasing amounts of block funding for certain programs, some provincial governments have withdrawn their previous degree of support for those programs or they have reduced their percentage contributions. If these allegations have any substance, federal efforts to help people may constitute a self-defeating process. If the premiers are saying, "Now that we have this federal money we will take our provincial funds and expend them for other purposes, such as road building," surely it may be time to question whether national programs designed to supplement provincial efforts are working for the people of this country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, with regard to those allegations, I simply remind the minister that they were made in the first instance by his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who, once the evidence was in, found it necessary to swallow them and to apologize for having made them. I am surprised he has not kept sufficiently in touch with the situation and that he is now repeating allegations that she has largely withdrawn.

So far as the process is concerned, no one has any objection whatsoever to a thoughtful process, but one must wait to see what the results of that process are. The former government brought in its budget in December, 1979, and there was no talk at that time of severe cutbacks in assistance to post-secondary education or to the other established programs.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will take this matter up with the Minister of Finance and, hopefully, a statement can be brought to the Senate which will cover the important points that have been raised by various honourable senators.

Senator Flynn: You improve every time you make a reply.

PARLIAMENT

INTERNSHIP PROGRAM

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the parliamentary internship program.

In light of items in the press that some of the outside sponsors of the program, such as business and industry, are threatening to reduce their support of the program, could the leader find out if it is the intention of the government to keep that worthwhile program going?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice.

Senator Marshall: I have a supplementary. Could he also find out, regarding this program which has been so valuable over the past three or four years—and it is called a parliamentary program—why those who are participating in the program studying parliamentary procedure are attached to the House of Commons, and why there is not an educational program for them to learn what the Senate is all about? If it is going to be called a parliamentary program, why doesn't it include the Senate?

Senator Flynn: It might be risky in some cases.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I understand that a number of representations have been made by interns and prospective interns on this very point. Discussions are underway, and I have been assured by my deputy leader that representations are being made to include the Senate in the program.

EDUCATION

REPAYMENT OF STUDENT LOANS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Riley on January 27, 1981, concerning the recovery of defaulted Canada student loans, and in particular, the use of commercial collection agencies for this purpose.

(The answer follows:)

Before dealing specifically with the points raised by the honourable senator, I thought it might be useful to review the general procedures followed when a student defaults on a loan. Under the Canada Student Loans Act, chartered banks or other designated lenders (such as caisses populaires) advance the funds under guarantee by the Government of Canada against any loss they may suffer should the loan not be repaid by the borrower.

When a borrower has ceased his studies, a repayment agreement is signed between the lender and the borrower. This repayment agreement sets out the terms of the loan and how it is to be repaid—normally, in equal monthly instalments over a period of time not exceeding ten years.

The obligations undertaken by the borrower when signing for a loan include not only an undertaking to repay the loan in the manner and time-frame set out but, as well, to keep the lender advised of all changes of address at all times. Unfortunately, a number of borrowers fail to fulfill these obligations, particularly with respect to keeping the bank advised of their whereabouts. About 75 per cent of all claims by lenders under the guarantee are submitted because the whereabouts of the borrower is not known or because of refusal to respond to bank requests for attention to the loan. I might add that where a borrower finds that the previously agreed terms for repayment are proving too onerous, the legislation authorizes lenders, in consultation with the borrowers, to revise repayment terms, taking into account the current financial position of the borrower, and thus avoid default on the loan. Our experience has been that a great number of students, who keep in touch with their bank, have benefitted from this facility and, therefore, have not necessitated a claim for loss on their loan.

Where a borrower fails to keep the bank advised of his or her location or fails to honour an agreed repayment schedule and does not respond to the bank's correspondence, the loan is claimed under the guarantee and, when paid by the government, the debt becomes due the Crown. The borrower is advised by program officials of this fact and that the debt is due and payable forthwith. The borrower is also advised that the account will be monitored by a commercial collection agency and that, should the borrower be unable to make payment in full, financial circumstances should be fully discussed and revised periodically so that an equitable monthly repayment schedule may be arrived at which is sensitive to the borrower's resources—the original agreement with the bank now being void because of the default. The government introduced the use of commercial agencies in 1970 after it had been determined that the cost to taxpayers would be less and results more effective than setting up a government collection system.

Two collection agencies are currently monitoring and/or collecting from some 80,000 defaulted accounts or about 9 per cent of nearly 1 million students who have borrowed. The agencies operate under contracts which are awarded under the normal tendering process. In addition, a directive, which forms part of the contract, places limitations on normal commercial collection procedures, such as seizure of assets, in the handling of student loan accounts. Agencies are not permitted to call a debtor at his place of work unless they have been unable to maintain contact through a home address or where the latter is not known. The level of complaints, such as that reported by the honourable senator, has been extremely low, amounting to less than ½ of 1 per cent of cases handled. Financial Collection Agencies Ltd. has been a successful bidder for the past 11 years, and in the very few cases where an employee has been found to have operated outside the directive, disciplinary action has been taken by the company.

With reference to the specific question by the honourable senator, Mr. McMillan is an employee of Financial Collection Agencies Ltd. at the Ottawa office. He is an experienced collector and has been monitoring the particular case to which the honourable senator has referred and subsequently identified to me. I have had an inquiry conducted into the handling of this case, and I find that the borrower in question had received very sympathetic treatment from the bank over a period of four years during which time payments were very erratic. The bank had been forced to send frequent reminders to the borrower to honour the repayment terms that he had agreed upon. Finally, when the borrower had ceased to respond to the bank's requests and the loan was 14 months in arrears, the bank claimed under the guarantee. The borrower's account was then sent to a maritime branch of the Financial Collection Agencies because the borrower's last known address was in the maritimes. However, after considerable tracing effort, the borrower was finally located in Ottawa in mid-July of last year. The account was, therefore, transferred to the Ottawa branch.

The debtor was contacted at home in July but refused to discuss financial circumstances, although a nominal monthly payment on account was offered. Then, three days later, the debtor called the agency and the financial position was discussed. Since the debtor had amounts outstanding with a number of creditors, some at high interest rates, the question of possible consolidation of loans at a bank was discussed. The debtor undertook to explore this avenue and the agency agreed to accept $50 per month failing full payment through a bank loan and, in fact, in August the debtor forwarded six post-dated cheques for $60 each. During this period the debtor and Mr. McMillan talked a number of times by telephone both at the debtor's office and home phones and the debtor did not express any concern at conducting this type of discussion at his office.

In accordance with normal procedures all accounts are reviewed on a six-month cycle by the agencies in order to ensure that payments are adjusted to the varying financial situations of the borrower. Accordingly, on January 27 the very same day that the honourable senator raised the matter in this chamber—Mr. McMillan endeavoured to contact the debtor to request an updated financial statement; the debtor returned Mr. McMillan's call from the office but refused to provide any financial data other than that there had been no change in the circumstances since last July. The debtor subsequently contacted program officials and was advised to provide further post-dated cheques and a certificate to the effect that there had been no change in earnings or general financial situation in the past six months. I understand that the debtor (who, by the way, is not a government employee) has since provided the necessary cheques and certificate and that the agency has accepted this for the next six-month period. In reviewing this case, I cannot find that the few telephone calls made by agency staff to the debtor over a six-month period would constitute harassment, nor do I find that, since the debtor called the agency a number of times from the work place, calls to the debtor at that telephone number were unwarranted.

The honourable senator also asked what commission is paid, and the answer is that the contract with Financial Collection Agencies provides for a commission of 25 per cent of amounts collected.

I hope my rather full statement will clarify the process for honourable senators and at the same time answer the points raised by Senator Riley.

In response to the supplementary question by Senator Bonnell, the Canada Student Loans Act is jointly administered by participating provinces and the federal government. Provincial authorities receive and assess applications for a loan and issue the necessary loan authorization to the student. Commercial lenders negotiate the loans on the basis of the loan authorization and, as I have noted earlier, the Government of Canada guarantees the lender against loss. The Department of the Secretary of State administers the guarantee provisions of the act and is responsible for the collection of delinquent loans, as I have already outlined.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

IRAN—RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked on January 27 by Senator Macquarrie concerning the possible repudiation of Ambassador Ken Taylor's actions in the freeing of American hostages.

The assertion by Iranian Executive Affairs Minister Nabavi on January 27 that Canada has asked to send diplomats back to Iran is without foundation. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs has stated on several occasions, the government believes there is no urgency about reactivating our embassy in Tehran. Before we take any decision on this, we will have to assess carefully the degree of risk to our staff there.

Similarly, there is no foundation in Mr. Nabavi's reported remark that we have asked for Iranian assurances on the safety of the staff we eventually send back. The Iranian government is already party to the Vienna Conventions on the immunity of diplomatic staff. However, it will be equally important for us to assess over the coming months whether the Iranian government is really willing or able to live up to their obligations.

In stipulating that Canada should not itself engage in certain activities—kidnapping, transferring people secretly and engaging in espionage—we assume Mr. Nabavi was talking about the sheltering and extrication of the six Americans. We do not see the need to give any assurances on this score. We consider that what we did to assist persons entitled to the protection of international law was fully justified from a legal as well as a humanitarian standpoint. The government would in any case hope that the circumstances which existed between November, 1979 and January, 1980, when the six Americans took refuge with us, will not arise again.

Honourable senators, on the same subject, a question was asked by Senator Smith on January 27 concerning the availability of information on Iran.

In the period from November 4, 1979 to January 28, 1980, when he finally departed Tehran, our former Ambassador to Iran, Ken Taylor, provided External Affairs with daily situation reports which sometimes included information available to him about the whereabouts or treatment of the hostages. Much of this information was available to other diplomatic missions in Tehran.

Throughout this period, the Canadian government shared Mr. Taylor's reports with the American authorities.

At no time after the Honourable Mark MacGuigan became Secretary of State for External Affairs was he made aware either of the use of Russian roulette or of any other abuses of the hostages, except through normal news reports.

It should be noted that most of the abuses and ill-treatment reported to the department were common knowledge and had been mentioned on occasion on TV. They consisted of playing martial music, binding of hostages' hands, blindfolding of hostages, papering of windows, et cetera.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, February 13, 1981, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

He said: Honourable senators will recall that when His Honour the Speaker called Notices of Motions earlier this afternoon I asked for leave to move a motion that we sit tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock. At that time the Leader of the Opposition asked that we give further consideration to sitting at that time for reasons that he advanced. It was felt by honourable senators that we should discuss the matter and decide on the procedure to be followed this week and next week on the two matters that were the subject of our discussion during that exchange, namely, receiving the report of the special joint committee and proceeding with any resolution for an Address to Her Majesty.

In the meantime I have conferred with the Leader of the Opposition. Without reviewing everything, it will be recalled that our concern was mainly about meeting tomorrow at 11 a.m., and whether we would meet simply to receive the report, to give any notices necessary with regard to the resolution, and to determine the procedure to be followed next week.

We have decided—I invite my honourable friend to correct me if I am wrong in stating what I understand the agreement to be—that we shall meet tomorrow at 11 a.m. for the purpose of receiving the report of the special joint committee. It will be presented for tabling as the first item and will come before anything else that might concern us. We will also receive notice of a resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty, and possibly a notice from the Leader of the Opposition in terms that he mentioned today, namely, that the Senate consider the advisability of proceeding on a concurrent rather than consecutive basis.

We wish to eliminate any points of order that might arise as a result of that. As the Leader of the Opposition and some of his colleagues, and perhaps other honourable senators, might wish to have a full discussion on why we are proceeding on the basis of a concurrent rather than consecutive presentation, we have agreed that before the Senate proceeds with any resolution for a Joint Address, the Leader of the Opposition will deal with his motion and place a limit on the debate, so that it will be clear that his interest is a genuine one—I am not suggesting otherwise—as an assurance to anyone who might think that there is anything tactical about it. He simply wants to have the matter examined and discussed, and, of course, is prepared to accept the vote of the Senate as a final decision on the matter.

Therefore, we shall meet tomorrow at 11 a.m. We shall receive the report of the special joint committee and it will be tabled. The government will then give notice of a motion for a Joint Address to Her Majesty. If that takes place, it will be in the form that we anticipate will be recommended by the committee. The Leader of the Opposition will then give his notice as to whether or not we should proceed concurrently before dealing with the Joint Address resolution. We agreed that that would be discussed first, or ahead of—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We agreed it would be the first order of the day.

Senator Frith: Yes, the first order of the day on Tuesday evening. In any event, that will be the proper notice for the resolution for an Address to Her Majesty, because that requires two days' notice with a sitting day in between.

When we return on Tuesday evening we will go through the order paper in the usual way. The first item on the Orders of the Day will be the motion that will have been presented. Normally, that would not come up until the end of the day, because "Motions" is the last item. However, we have agreed that that will be the procedure and that there will be a vote. The vote can be taken on Tuesday if necessary, but it is agreed that it will take place by the end of the sitting on Wednesday. We will then proceed with the rest of the Senate's business, depending on what occurs with regard to that motion.

Have I stated the agreement correctly?

Senator Flynn: Yes. May I explain that the vote should be taken on Wednesday at the latest, because we will be discussing only the problem of concurrent, rather than consecutive, debate. Of course, when the resolution comes before us, we may have other motions to make in connection with it. That may have the same effect. However, I wanted to isolate that question, to give an opportunity to the Senate to express its views on concurrent debate on such an important matter.

I understand that tomorrow the Senate will not deal with any of the items on the order paper, apart from receiving the report and giving the two notices of motions that have been mentioned. Also, of course, there may be some questions asked of the Leader of the Government and other ministers.

Senator Frith: Or any business arising out of the items that we shall be dealing with.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Do I take it, from what the Deputy Leader of the Government has said, that the house will not sit on Monday night?

Senator Frith: That is correct.

Senator Flynn: Therefore, the question can be put.

Motion agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1981

THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-56, to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, and other Acts subsequent to 1970.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILL

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, February 10, the debate on the motion of Senator Godfrey for the third reading of Bill S-15, respecting The Royal Canadian Legion.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to speak at any length at this time on third reading of this bill. I made clear my opposition to its being passed at the time of second reading, and the hearing that I attended before the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science has not changed my views. The committee hearing was, however, certainly worthwhile and cleared up a number of points.

At that committee hearing the reasons why the Dominion Command wants this amendment were clearly set out, and it was interesting to hear that the desire or need to obtain new members was not the only reason, or, indeed, the main reason. As in the case of the 1978 amendment, the reason given for this proposed amendment is the need to obtain new and younger members if the Legion is to continue its various activities on the same scale as at present. The need for new members, of course, arises from the decrease in membership of veterans due to deaths and retirements.

This could be a general reason for an amendment, though not, in my opinion, for such a broad amendment as is proposed in Bill S-15. From that point of view, indeed, there would not appear to be any need for such an amendment at this time. You will recall that the 1978 amendment allowed the sons and daughters of veterans to join the Legion, and apparently many have done so. The only reason given for that amendment was the need to keep up the membership and to take care of losses due to deaths and other reasons as the average age of the members increased.

The figures given to the committee in this respect were interesting. Apparently, the loss of members due to normal attrition over the past four years was about 8,000 members—in exact figures, 7,935. At the end of 1980, however, there were 116,009 members who were sons and daughters of veterans, so that apparently there is no immediate need to open up the membership lists, though this may be necessary in the future if it is desirable for the Legion to continue to be involved in all the activities in which it is involved at present.

At the committee meeting, however, honourable senators, another and, in my opinion, much more valid reason was given for the need for an amendment of some kind at this time. As the sponsor mentioned, over the years various persons who served in wartime in one capacity or another, though not in the armed forces, were accepted into membership in the Royal Canadian Legion. It was not realized that the Legion did not have the authority, under its act of incorporation, to do this. Certainly, there would be no objection to correcting that situation by an amendment to the Legion's act of incorporation. Bill S-15, however, goes far beyond that, if, indeed, it does, if passed, correct that situation, since it does not, as far as I can see, act in a retroactive manner.

Honourable senators, as I mentioned on second reading, I am opposed to this bill, since I feel that it can in due course change the whole purpose of The Royal Canadian Legion. It would enable the membership to be wide open, indeed, so wide open that the whole purpose of the Legion could be changed.

The exact wording to which I object is, "of others who support the purposes and objects of the Legion." You will note that there is no limitation as to citizenship, yet all those persons who were mentioned by the sponsor, in the classifications given, have to be Canadian citizens or Commonwealth subjects. You will also note that there is no limitation as to domicile or residence. Indeed, the impression I received is that this broad amendment as to membership is desired not only to correct the situation regarding those admitted to membership who are not authorized by the act of incorporation, but also to provide the authority to admit anyone who is willing to state that he or she supports the objects and purposes of the Legion, whatever these may come to be in the future.

I may say, honourable senators, that I was concerned when the president of the Dominion Command stated in the committee that the Legion is no longer a veterans' organization, but is now an organization for veterans. I am surprised by this, and if it is so, I would expect that the number of actual Canadian veterans in the Legion is now less than the number of other members, and perhaps the sponsor would obtain the actual figures with regard to that for the record.

Honourable senators, as I believe the amendment regarding the qualification for membership in the Legion could open the way for membership which could change the whole character and purposes of the Legion, I am unable to support this bill on third reading.

On motion of Senator Murray, for Senator Smith, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Croll, for the second reading of the Bill C-54, intituled: "An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax".—(Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C.).

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not intend to proceed with this item myself this afternoon. Naturally, I would not stand in the way of anyone else who wants to speak. I hope that this will be agreeable to the Senate, because while the subject matter is important and timely, it is before a committee of the Senate on a pre-study basis, so that our failure to deal with it today in the Senate will in no way hold up the progress of the bill, as far as I can see. I therefore ask the indulgence of the Senate in allowing this order to stand.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have spoken with Senator Barrow about that very point. Just to reassure honourable senators, I believe there are two sittings of the committee dealing with the pre-study of this bill scheduled for next week. I have cleared with the chairman that everything Senator Roblin says is quite correct.

Senator Roblin: That is quite right. He very kindly spoke to me in the same terms.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

TRANSPORT

PACIFIC OCEAN—WEATHER SHIPS—AIR-SEA RESCUE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Bell on January 22, 1981, concerning the weather ships on the west coast.

On October 7, 1980, the Minister of the Environment announced the withdrawal of the Canadian weather ships from the Pacific Ocean, effective June, 1981.

New technology is being developed by Environment Canada as an alternative to the present weather ships. The new system includes a station to receive and process imagery from weather satellites, new automatic weather stations along the British Columbia coast, a network of drifting buoys in the northeast

Pacific and increased staff at the Pacific weather centre to maximize the use of all this information. In addition, it should provide Environment Canada with the capability to exploit fully new technological advances in weather data collection and the improvements in meteorological models.

The decision to terminate the weather ship program was made in 1978 by the Treasury Board. Since April 1979, Environment Canada has kept the ship program operating at the expense of other priority programs, many of which are of interest and concern to the people of British Columbia. The alternative system in place or planned for the immediate future is the best that will be available this decade, and I have been advised by Environment Canada that it cannot commit itself to the spending of about $100 million during the 1980s to keep the ship program until even newer technology arrives.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND THE HOUSE OF COMMONS ON THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

REPORT

The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada has the honour to report as follows:

Orders of Reference

The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada was established pursuant to Orders of Reference adopted on October 23, 1980 by the House of Commons and on November 3, 1980 by the Senate. The Orders of Reference read in part as follows:

> "That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the Government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an Address, with such amendments as the Committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;"

Additional Orders of Reference were issued by both Houses. The complete text of all Orders of Reference is set out in Appendix A.

Introduction

The Committee's report is divided into four main parts. Part I is entitled "Organization of Committee's Work" and describes the Committee's activities. Part II is entitled "Summary of Evidence" and outlines the evidence presented by governments, groups and individuals. Part III describes the Committee's response to the submissions received by it. Part IV sets out the Committee's recommendation to the Senate and the House of Commons.

I. Organization of Committee's Work

1. Initial Action

The Committee commenced sitting on November 6, 1980. By advertisements published in the major daily newspapers throughout Canada, the Committee asked for written submissions and indicated that witnesses would be invited to appear.

Beginning on Monday, November 17, 1980, pursuant to further Orders of both Houses, the sittings of the Committee were broadcast on television and radio on a regular basis.

2. Outline of Activities

The work of the Committee fell into four phases. On November 7, the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Jean Chrétien, the first witness, made his opening statement. On November 12 and 13, he was examined by Committee members. From November 14 to January 9, witnesses representing groups and governments, and individual witnesses, were heard. On January 12, the Minister of Justice returned for the "clause by clause" consideration which continued until February 9. Thereupon, the committee proceeded in camera to prepare this Report.

The Committee was composed of 25 members of whom 10 were from the Senate and 15 from the House of Commons. There were 15 members of the Liberal Party, 8 members of the Progressive Conservative Party and 2 members of the New Democratic Party. A substantial number of other Senators and members of the House of Commons participated in the work of the Committee at one time or another as indicated on the inside front cover of Issue No. 57 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Committee. The Committee held 106 meetings on 56 sitting days for a total of 267 sitting hours. The Minister of Justice, Mr. Chrétien, appeared as a witness 39 times and the acting Minister, the Honourable Robert Kaplan, appeared on his behalf 9 times. Clause by clause consideration occupied 90.5 hours.

The resources of both Houses of Parliament and the Library of Parliament, as well as those of the Department of Justice, the Federal-Provincial Relations Office and other government departments, the Prime Minister's Office and the Parliamentary Centre for Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade, were directed to the facilitation of the work of the Committee.

3. Participation by Governments, Groups and Individuals

As of February 2, 1981, 914 individuals and 294 groups had sent letters, telegrams and briefs to the Committee. Of those that expressed a wish to appear before the Committee, the Premiers of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Saskatchewan, representatives of the Governments of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories and 104 groups and individuals attended as witnesses. The groups represented a broad cross section of Canadian Society. A list of those who were invited to give evidence as witnesses is attached as Appendix B. A list of those who had, as of February 2, 1981, made written submissions to the Committee is attached as Appendix C. The complete text of the oral evidence may be found in Issues 1 to 56 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Committee.

II. Summary of Evidence

The Research Branch of the Library of Parliament prepared a statistical account of the 962 briefs, letters and telegrams sent to the Committee prior to December 31, 1980, the last date for the receipt of such submissions. Specific comments on the proposed Resolution as a whole, on any of the major issues raised thereby or on any clauses contained therein, were categorized in tabular form. This account is set out as Appendix D. Written submissions received after December 31, 1980 were made available to Committee members but are not reflected in Appendix D.

III. Response to Submissions and Evidence

On January 12, 1981, the Minister of Justice, on behalf of the government, presented to the Committee a consolidation containing a number of suggested amendments to the proposed Resolution. The Progressive Conservative and New Democratic Parties thereupon responded with amendments both to the original resolution and to the consolidation. The government proposed 58 amendments of which 58 were approved; the Progressive Conservative Party proposed 22 amendments of which 7 were approved; and the New Democratic Party proposed 43 amendments of which 2 were approved.

IV. Recommendation

Your Committee has considered the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980 and, in particular, has considered what amendments were necessary to the Address contained in the document, and whether or not the Address as amended by the Committee should be presented on behalf of both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen.

Your Committee recommends that the Government propose to the Senate and the House of Commons for adoption a Resolution for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada, and that such Resolution be the "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the government on October 2, 1980, as amended and approved by this Committee; and that, upon its adoption by the Senate and the House of Commons, the Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen.

Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada, as amended by the Committee

WHEREAS in the past certain amendments to the Constitution of Canada have been made by the Parliament of the United Kingdom at the request and with the consent of Canada;

AND WHEREAS it is in accord with the status of Canada as an independent state that Canadians be able to amend their Constitution in Canada in all respects;

AND WHEREAS it is also desirable to provide in the Constitution of Canada for the recognition of certain fundamental rights and freedoms and to make other amendments to that Constitution;

NOW THEREFORE the Senate and the House of Commons, in Parliament assembled, resolve that a respectful address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty:
Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's loyal subjects, the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, respectfully approach Your Majesty, requesting that you may graciously be pleased to cause to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom a measure containing the recitals and clauses hereinafter set forth:

Le Sénat et la Chambre des communes du Canada réunis en Parlement, considérant :

que le Parlement du Royaume-Uni a modifié à plusieurs reprises la Constitution du Canada à la demande et avec le consentement de celui-ci;

que, de par le statut d'État indépendant du Canada, il est légitime que les Canadiens aient tout pouvoir pour modifier leur Constitution au Canada;

qu'il est souhaitable d'inscrire dans la Constitution du Canada la reconnaissance de certains droits et libertés fondamentaux et d'y apporter d'autres modifications, ont résolu de présenter respectueusement à Sa Majesté la Reine l'adresse dont la teneur suit :

A Sa Très Excellente Majesté la Reine,
Très Gracieuse Souveraine :

Nous, membres du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes du Canada réunis en Parlement, fidèles sujets de Votre Majesté, demandons respectueusement à Votre Très Gracieuse Majesté de bien vouloir faire déposer devant le Parlement du Royaume-Uni un projet de loi ainsi conçu :

ANNEXE A—SCHEDULE A

An Act to amend the Constitution of Canada

Loi modifiant la Constitution du Canada

Whereas Canada has requested and consented to the enactment of an Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom to give effect to the provisions hereinafter set forth and the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled have submitted an address to Her Majesty requesting that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a Bill to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom for that purpose.

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

Sa Très Excellente Majesté la Reine, considérant :

qu'à la demande et avec le consentement du Canada, le Parlement du Royaume-Uni est invité à adopter une loi visant à donner effet aux dispositions énoncées ci-après et que le Sénat et la Chambre des communes du Canada réunis en Parlement ont présenté une adresse demandant à Sa Très Gracieuse Majesté de bien vouloir faire déposer devant le Parlement du Royaume-Uni un projet de loi à cette fin,

sur l'avis et du consentement des Lords spirituels et temporels et des Communes réunis en Parlement, et par l'autorité de celui-ci, édicte :

Constitution Act, 1981 enacted

1. The Constitution Act, 1981 set out in Schedule B to this Act is hereby enacted for and shall have the force of law in Canada and shall come into force as provided in that Act.

(d) to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law in a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal;

(e) not to be denied reasonable bail without just cause;

(f) except in the case of an offence under military law tried before a military tribunal, to the benefit of trial by jury where the maximum punishment for the offence is imprisonment for five years or a more severe punishment;

(g) not to be found guilty on account of any act or omission unless, at the time of the act or omission, it constituted an offence under Canadian or international law or was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations;

(h) if finally acquitted of the offence, not to be tried for it again and, if finally found guilty and punished for the offence, not to be tried or punished for it again; and

(i) if found guilty of the offence and if the punishment for the offence has been varied between the time of commission and the time of sentencing, to the benefit of the lesser punishment.

Affaires criminelles et pénales

11. Tout inculpé a le droit :

a) d'être informé sans délai anormal de l'infraction précise qu'on lui reproche;

b) d'être jugé dans un délai raisonnable;

c) de ne pas être contraint de témoigner contre lui-même dans toute poursuite intentée contre lui pour l'infraction qu'on lui reproche;

d) d'être présumé innocent tant qu'il n'est pas déclaré coupable, conformément à la loi, par un tribunal indépendant et impartial à l'issue d'un procès public et équitable;

e) de ne pas être privé sans juste cause d'une mise en liberté assortie d'un cautionnement raisonnable;

f) sauf s'il s'agit d'une infraction relevant de la justice militaire, de bénéficier d'un procès avec jury lorsque la peine maximale prévue pour l'infraction dont il est accusé est un emprisonnement de cinq ans ou une peine plus grave;

g) de ne pas être déclaré coupable en raison d'une action ou d'une omission qui, au moment où elle est survenue, ne constituait pas une infraction d'après le droit interne du Canada ou le droit international et n'avait pas de caractère criminel d'après les principes généraux de droit reconnus par l'ensemble des nations;

h) d'une part de ne pas être jugé de nouveau pour une infraction dont il a été définitivement acquitté, d'autre part de ne pas être jugé ni puni de nouveau pour une infraction dont il a été définitivement trouvé coupable et puni;

i) de bénéficier de la peine la moins sévère, lorsque la peine qui sanctionne l'infraction dont il est déclaré coupable est modifiée entre le moment de la perpétration de l'infraction et celui de la sentence.

Treatment or punishment

12. Everyone has the right not to be subjected to any cruel and unusual treatment or punishment.

Cruauté

12. Chacun a droit à la protection contre tous traitements ou peines cruels et inusités.

Self-incrimination

Continuation of existing constitutional provisions

21. Nothing in sections 16 to 20 abrogates or derogates from any right, privilege or obligation with respect to the English and French languages, or either of them, that exists or is continued by virtue of any other provision of the Constitution of Canada.

Maintien en vigueur de certaines dispositions

21. Les articles 16 à 20 n'ont pas pour effet, en ce qui a trait à la langue française ou anglaise ou à ces deux langues, de porter atteinte aux droits, privilèges ou obligations qui existent ou sont maintenus aux termes d'une autre disposition de la Constitution du Canada.

Rights and privileges preserved

22. Nothing in sections 16 to 20 abrogates or derogates from any legal or customary right or privilege acquired or enjoyed either before or after the coming into force of this Charter with respect to any language that is not English or French.

Droits préservés

22. Les articles 16 à 20 n'ont pas pour effet de porter atteinte aux droits et privilèges, antérieurs ou postérieurs à l'entrée en vigueur de la présente charte et découlant de la loi ou de la coutume, des langues autres que le français ou l'anglais.

Minority Language Educational Rights

Droits à l'instruction dans la langue de la minorité

Language of instruction

23. (1) Citizens of Canada

(a) whose first language learned and still understood is that of the English or French linguistic minority population of the province in which they reside, or have the right to have their children receive primary and secondary school instruction in that language in that province.

Langue d'instruction

23. (1) Les citoyens canadiens :

a) dont la première langue apprise et encore comprise est celle de la minorité francophone ou anglophone de la province où ils résident,

b) qui ont reçu leur instruction, au niveau primaire, en français ou en anglais au Canada et qui résident dans une province où la langue dans laquelle ils ont reçu cette instruction est celle de la minorité francophone ou anglophone de la province, ont, dans l'un ou l'autre cas, le droit d'y faire instruire leurs enfants, aux niveaux primaire et secondaire, dans cette langue.

Continuity of language instruction

(2) Citizens of Canada of whom any child has received or is receiving primary or secondary school instruction in English or French in Canada, have the right to have all their children receive primary and secondary school instruction in the same language.

Continuité d'emploi de la langue d'instruction

(2) Les citoyens canadiens dont un enfant a reçu ou reçoit son instruction, au niveau primaire ou secondaire, en français ou en anglais au Canada ont le droit de faire instruire tous leurs enfants, aux niveaux primaire et secondaire, dans la langue de cette instruction.

Application where numbers warrant

(3) The right of citizens of Canada under subsections (1) and (2) to have their children receive primary and secondary school instruction in the language of the English or French linguistic minority population of a province

(a) applies wherever in the province the number of children of citizens who have such a right is sufficient to warrant the provision to them out of public funds of minority language instruction; and

Justification par le nombre

(3) Le droit reconnu aux citoyens canadiens par les paragraphes (1) et (2) de faire instruire leurs enfants, aux niveaux primaire et secondaire, dans la langue de la minorité francophone ou anglophone d'une province :

a) s'exerce partout dans la province où le nombre des enfants des citoyens qui ont ce droit est suffisant pour justifier à leur endroit la prestation, sur les fonds publics, de l'instruction dans la langue de la minorité;

(b) includes, where the number of those children so warrants, the right to have them receive that instruction in minority language educational facilities provided out of public funds.

b) comprend, lorsque le nombre de ces enfants le justifie, le droit de les faire instruire dans des établissements d'enseignement de la minorité linguistique financés sur les fonds publics.

Enforcement

Recours

Enforcement of guaranteed rights and freedoms

24. (1) Anyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

24. (1) Toute personne, victime de violation ou de négation des droits et libertés qui lui sont garantis par la présente charte, peut s'adresser à un tribunal compétent pour obtenir la réparation que le tribunal estime convenable et juste eu égard aux circonstances.

Commitment respecting public services

(2) Parliament and the government of Canada are committed to the principle of making equalization payments to ensure that provincial governments have sufficient revenues to provide reasonably comparable levels of public services at reasonably comparable levels of taxation.

Engagement relatif aux services publics

PART IV

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCES

PARTIE IV

CONFÉRENCES CONSTITUTIONNELLES

Constitutional conferences

35. (1) Until Part VI comes into force, a constitutional conference composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces shall be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada at least once in every year.

Conférences constitutionnelles

35. (1) Avant l'entrée en vigueur de la partie VI, le premier ministre du Canada convoque au moins une fois par an une conférence constitutionnelle réunissant les premiers ministres provinciaux et lui-même.

Participation of aboriginal peoples

(2) A conference convened under subsection (1) shall have included in its agenda an item respecting constitutional matters that directly affect the aboriginal peoples of Canada, including the identification and definition of the rights of those peoples to be included in the Constitution of Canada, and the Prime Minister of Canada shall invite representatives of those peoples to participate in the discussions on that item.

Participation des peuples autochtones

Participation of territories

(3) The Prime Minister of Canada shall invite elected representatives of the governments of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories to participate in the discussions on any item on the agenda of a conference convened under subsection (1) that, in the opinion of the Prime Minister, directly affects the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

Participation des territoires

PART V

INTERIM AMENDMENT PROCEDURE AND RULES FOR ITS REPLACEMENT

Interim procedure for amending Constitution of Canada

36. Until Part VI comes into force, an amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and by the legislative assembly or government of each province.

Amendment of provisions relating to some but not all provinces

37. Until Part VI comes into force, an amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to any provision that applies to one or more, but not all, provinces may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and by the legislative assembly or government of each province to which the amendment applies.

Amendments respecting certain language rights

38. (1) Notwithstanding section 40, an amendment to the Constitution of Canada

(a) adding a province as a province named in subsection 16(2), 17(2), 18(2), 19(2) or 20(2), or

(b) otherwise providing for any or all of the rights guaranteed or obligations imposed by any of those subsections to have application in a province to the extent and under the conditions stated in the amendment, may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and the legislative assembly of the province to which the amendment applies.

Initiation of amendment procedure

(2) The procedure for amendment prescribed by subsection (1) may be initiated only by the legislative assembly of the province to which the amendment applies.

Initiation of amendment procedures

39. (1) The procedures for amendment prescribed by sections 36 and 37 may be initiated either by the Senate or House of Commons or by the legislative assembly or government of a province.

PARTIE V

PROCÉDURE PROVISOIRE DE MODIFICATION ET RÈGLES DE REMPLACEMENT

Procédure provisoire de modification

Modification à l'égard de certaines provinces

37. Avant l'entrée en vigueur de la partie VI, les dispositions de la Constitution du Canada applicables à certaines provinces seulement peuvent être modifiées par proclamation du gouverneur général sous le grand sceau du Canada, autorisée par des résolutions du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes et par l'assemblée législative ou le gouvernement de chaque province à laquelle la modification s'applique.

Modification concernant certains droits linguistiques

38. (1) Par dérogation à l'article 40, toute modification de la Constitution du Canada :

a) soit portant insertion du nom d'une province aux paragraphes 16(2), 17(2), 18(2), 19(2) ou 20(2),

b) soit prévoyant l'application à une province, aux conditions précisées dans la modification, de tout ou partie des droits ou obligations visés à ces paragraphes, peut être prise par proclamation du gouverneur général sous le grand sceau du Canada, autorisée par des résolutions du Sénat, de la Chambre des communes et de l'assemblée législative de la province concernée.

Initiative de la procédure

(2) L'initiative de la procédure de modification visée au paragraphe (1) appartient à l'assemblée législative de la province concernée.

Initiative des procédures

39. (1) L'initiative des procédures de modification visées aux articles 36 et 37 appartient au Sénat, à la Chambre des communes, à l'assemblée législative d'une province ou au gouvernement de celle-ci.

Revocation of authorization

(2) A resolution made or other authorization given for the purposes of this Part may be revoked at any time before the issue of a proclamation authorized by it.

Limitation on use of interim amendment procedure

40. Sections 36 and 37 do not apply to an amendment to the Constitution of Canada where there is another provision in the Constitution for making the amendment, but the procedure prescribed by section 36 shall be used to amend the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and any provision for amending the Constitution, including this section.

Coming into force of Part VI

41. Part VI shall come into force

(a) with or without amendment, on such day as may be fixed by proclamation issued pursuant to the procedure prescribed by section 36, or

(b) on the day that is two years after the day this Act, except Part VI, comes into force, whichever is the earlier day but, if a referendum is required to be held under subsection 42(3), Part VI shall come into force as provided in section 43.

Provincial alternative procedure

42. (1) The legislative assemblies of seven or more provinces that have, according to the then latest general census, combined populations of at least eighty per cent of the population of all the provinces may make a single proposal to substitute for paragraph 45(1)(b) such alternative as they consider appropriate.

Procedure for perfecting alternative

(2) One copy of an alternative proposed under subsection (1) may be deposited with the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada by each proposing province within two years after this Act, except Part VI, comes into force but, prior to the expiration of that period, any province that has deposited a copy may withdraw that copy.

Referendum

(3) Where copies of an alternative have been deposited as provided by subsection (2) and, on the day that is two years after this Act, except Part VI, comes into force, at least seven copies remain deposited by provinces that have, according to the then latest

Possibilité de révocation

(2) La résolution adoptée ou l'autorisation donnée dans le cadre de la présente partie peut être révoquée à tout moment avant la date de la proclamation qu'elle autorise.

Restriction du recours à la procédure provisoire

40. Les articles 36 et 37 ne s'appliquent pas aux cas de modification constitutionnelle pour lesquels une procédure différente est prévue par une autre disposition de la Constitution du Canada. La procédure visée à l'article 36 s'impose toutefois pour modifier la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, ainsi que les dispositions relatives à la modification de la Constitution, y compris le présent article.

Entrée en vigueur de la partie VI

41. La partie VI entre en vigueur à la première des dates suivantes :

a) avec ou sans modification, à la date fixée par proclamation prise conformément à la procédure visée à l'article 36;

b) deux ans après l'entrée en vigueur, exception faite de la partie VI, de la présente loi.

Il demeure entendu que, si la tenue d'un référendum s'impose conformément au paragraphe 42(3), la partie VI entre en vigueur conformément à l'article 43.

Proposition de remplacement

42. (1) Les assemblées législatives d'au moins sept provinces dont la population confondue représente, selon le recensement général le plus récent à l'époque, au moins quatre-vingts pour cent de la population de toutes les provinces peuvent présenter une proposition commune en vue de remplacer la procédure prévue à l'alinéa 45(1)b).

Possibilité de mise au point

Référendum

(3) Dans les cas où, deux ans après l'entrée en vigueur, exception faite de la partie VI, de la présente loi, au moins sept provinces remplissant les conditions démographiques visées au paragraphe (1) n'ont pas retiré leur texte, le gouvernement du Canada

general census, combined populations of at least eighty per cent of the population of all the provinces, the government of Canada shall cause a referendum to be held within two years after that day to determine whether

(b) the alternative proposed by the provinces,

fait tenir, dans les deux années suivant l'échéance des deux ans, un référendum pour déterminer laquelle des procédures suivantes sera adoptée :

a) celle qui est prévue à l'alinéa 45(1)b) ou l'éventuelle procédure de remplacement adoptée par des résolutions du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes et dont le texte est déposé auprès du directeur général des élections au moins quatre-vingt-dix jours avant la date du référendum;

b) celle qui fait l'objet de la proposition des provinces.

Coming into force of Part VI where referendum held

43. Where a referendum is held under subsection 42(3), a proclamation under the Great Seal of Canada shall be issued within six months after the date of the referendum bringing Part VI into force with such modifications, if any, as are necessary to incorporate the proposal approved by a majority of the persons voting at the referendum and with such other changes as are reasonably consequential on the incorporation of that proposal.

Entrée en vigueur de la partie VI après référendum

43. Dans les six mois suivant la date du référendum visé au paragraphe 42(3), une proclamation sous le grand sceau du Canada est prise en vue de faire entrer en vigueur la partie VI, éventuellement modifiée dans la mesure nécessaire pour incorporer la proposition approuvée par la majorité des votants et pour intégrer les autres aménagements justifiés qui en découlent.

Right to vote

44. (1) Every citizen of Canada has, subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society, the right to vote in a referendum held under subsection 42(3).

Droit de vote

44. (1) Tout citoyen canadien a le droit de vote au référendum visé au paragraphe 42(3); ce droit ne peut être restreint que par une règle de droit, dans des limites qui soient raisonnables et dont la justification puisse se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique.

Establishment of Referendum Rules Commission

(2) If a referendum is required to be held under subsection 42(3), a Referendum Rules Commission shall forthwith be established by commission issued under the Great Seal of Canada consisting of (a) the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada, who shall be chairman of the Commission;

(b) a person appointed by the Governor General in Council; and Limitation on use of general amendment procedure

51. (1) The procedures prescribed by section 45, 46 or 47 do not apply to an amendment to the Constitution of Canada where there is another provision in the Constitution for making the amendment, but the procedures prescribed by section 45 or 46 shall, nevertheless, be used to amend any provision for amending the Constitution, including this section.

51. (1) Les articles 45, 46 ou 47 ne s'appliquent pas aux cas de modification constitutionnelle pour lesquels une procédure différente est prévue par une autre disposition de la Constitution du Canada. La procédure visée aux articles 45 ou 46 s'impose toutefois pour modifier les dispositions relatives à la modification de la Constitution, y compris le présent article.

Restriction du recours à la procédure normale de modification

Idem

(2) The procedures prescribed by section 45 or 46 do not apply in respect of an amendment referred to in section 47.

Idem

(2) Les procédures prévues aux articles 45 ou 46 ne s'appliquent pas à la modification visée à l'article 47.

Amendments by Parliament

52. Subject to section 54, Parliament may exclusively make laws amending the Constitution of Canada in relation to the executive government of Canada or the Senate or House of Commons.

Modification par le Parlement

52. Sous réserve de l'article 54, le Parlement a compétence exclusive pour modifier les dispositions de la Constitution du Canada relatives au pouvoir exécutif fédéral, au Sénat et à la Chambre des communes.

Amendments by provincial legislatures

53. Subject to section 54, the legislature of each province may exclusively make laws amending the constitution of the province.

Modification par les législatures provinciales

53. Sous réserve de l'article 54, la législature de chaque province a compétence exclusive pour modifier la constitution de celle-ci.

Matters requiring amendment under general amendment procedure

54. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made only in accordance with a procedure prescribed by section 45 or 46:

(a) the office of the Queen, the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor of a province;

(b) the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms;

(c) the commitments relating to equalization and regional disparities set out in section 34;

(f) the method of selecting Senators and the residence qualifications of Senators;

(g) the right of a province to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of Senators representing the province; and

(h) the principles of proportionate representation of the provinces in the House of Commons prescribed by the Constitution of Canada.

Recours obligatoire à procédure normale de modification

54. Toute modification de la Constitution du Canada portant sur les questions suivantes se fait selon la procédure visée aux articles 45 ou 46 :

a) la charge de Reine, celle de gouverneur général et celle de lieutenant-gouverneur;

b) la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés;

c) les engagements énoncés, en matière de péréquation et d'inégalités régionales, à l'article 34;

d) les pouvoirs du Sénat;

e) le nombre de sénateurs représentant chaque province au Sénat;

f) le mode de sélection des sénateurs et les conditions de résidence qu'ils doivent remplir;

g) le droit d'une province d'avoir à la Chambre des communes un nombre de députés au moins égal à celui de ses sénateurs;

h) les principes de la représentation proportionnelle des provinces à la Chambre des communes prévus par la Constitution du Canada.

Modificatio corrélatives

55. (1) La rubrique 1 de l'article 91 et la rubrique 1 de l'article 92 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867 (antérieurement désignée sous le titre : Acte de l'Amérique du Nord britannique, 1867), l'Acte de l'Amérique du Nord britannique (nº 2), 1949, mentionné au nº 22 de l'annexe I de la présente loi, et les parties IV et V de la présente loi sont abrogés.

Idem

(2) When Parts IV and V of this Act are repealed, this section may be repealed and this Act may be renumbered, consequential upon the repeal of those Parts and this section, by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada.

Idem

(2) Dès l'abrogation des parties IV et V de la présente loi, le gouverneur général peut, par proclamation sous le grand sceau du Canada, abroger le présent article et changer en conséquence de cette double abrogation la numérotation de la présente loi.

PART VII

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

PARTIE VII

MODIFICATION DE LA LOI CONSTITUTIONNELLE DE 1867

Amendment to Constitution Act, 1867

56. (1) The Constitution Act, 1867 (formerly named the British North America Act, 1867) is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 92 thereof, the following heading and section:

Modification de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867

56. (1) La Loi constitutionnelle de 1867 (antérieurement désignée sous le titre : Acte de l'Amérique du Nord britannique, 1867) est modifiée par l'insertion, après l'article 92, de la rubrique et de l'article suivants :

"Non-Renewable Natural Resources, Forestry Resources and Electrical Energy

«Ressources naturelles non renouvelables, ressources forestières et énergie électrique

Laws respecting non-renewable natural resources, forestry resources and electrical energy

92A. (1) In each province, the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to

(a) exploration for non-renewable natural resources in the province;

(b) development, conservation and management of non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province, including laws in relation to the rate of primary production therefrom; and

(c) development, conservation and management of sites and facilities in the province for the generation and production of electrical energy.

Compétence provinciale

92A. (1) La législature de chaque province a compétence exclusive pour légiférer dans les domaines suivants :

a) prospection des ressources naturelles non renouvelables de la province;

b) exploitation, conservation et gestion des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières de la province, y compris leur rythme de production primaire;

c) aménagement, conservation et gestion des emplacements et des installations de la province destinés à la production d'énergie électrique.

Export from provinces of resources

(2) In each province, the legislature may make laws in relation to the export from the province to another part of Canada of the primary production from non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province and the production from facilities in the province for the generation of electrical energy, but such laws may not authorize or provide for discrimination in prices or in supplies exported to another part of Canada.

Exportation hors des provinces

Authority of Parliament

(3) Nothing in subsection (2) derogates from the authority of Parliament to enact laws in relation to the matters referred to

Pouvoir du Parlement

(3) Le paragraphe (2) ne porte pas atteinte au pouvoir du Parlement de légiférer dans les domaines visés à ce paragra-

in that subsection and, where such a law of Parliament and a law of a province conflict, the law of Parliament prevails to the extent of the conflict.

Taxation of resources

(4) In each province, the legislature may make laws in relation to the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation in respect of

(a) non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province and the primary production therefrom, and

(b) sites and facilities in the province for the generation of electrical energy and the production therefrom, whether or not such production is exported in whole or in part from the province, but such laws may not authorize or provide for taxation that differentiates between production exported to another part of Canada and production not exported from the province.

"Primary production"

(5) The expression "primary production" has the meaning assigned by the Sixth Schedule.

Existing powers or rights

(6) Nothing in subsections (1) to (5) derogates from any powers or rights that a legislature or government of a province had immediately before the coming into force of this section."

Idem

57. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following Schedule:

"THE SIXTH SCHEDULE

Primary Production from Non-Renewable Natural Resources and Forestry Resources

1. For the purposes of section 92A of this Act,

(a) production from a non-renewable natural resource is primary production therefrom if

phe, les dispositions d'une loi du Parlement adoptée dans ces domaines l'emportant sur les dispositions incompatibles d'une loi provinciale.

Taxation de ressources

(4) La législature de chaque province a compétence pour prélever des sommes d'argent par tout mode ou système de taxation :

a) des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières de la province, ainsi que de la production primaire qui en est tirée;

b) des emplacements et des installations de la province destinés à la production d'énergie électrique, ainsi que cette production même.

Cette compétence peut s'exercer indépendamment du fait que la production en cause soit ou non, en totalité ou en partie, exportée hors de la province, mais les lois adoptées dans ces domaines ne peuvent autoriser ou prévoir une taxation qui établisse une distinction entre la production exportée à destination d'une autre partie du Canada et la production non exportée hors de la province.

(5) L'expression «production primaire» a le sens qui lui est donné dans la sixième annexe.

Pouvoirs ou droits exist

Idem

57. La présente loi est en outre modifiée par l'adjonction de l'annexe suivante :

«SIXIÈME ANNEXE

Production primaire tirée des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières

1. Pour l'application de l'article 92A :

a) on entend par production primaire tirée d'une ressource naturelle non renouvelable :

(i) it is in the form in which it exists upon its recovery or severance from its natural state, or

(ii) it is a product resulting from processing or refining the resource, and is not a manufactured product or a product resulting from refining crude oil, refining upgraded heavy crude oil, refining gases or liquids derived from coal or refining a synthetic equivalent of crude oil; and

(b) production from a forestry resource is primary production therefrom if it consists of sawlogs, poles, lumber, wood chips, sawdust or any other primary wood product, or wood pulp, and is not a product manufactured from wood."

(i) soit le produit qui se présente sous la même forme que lors de son extraction du milieu naturel,

b) on entend par production primaire tirée d'une ressource forestière la production constituée de billots, de poteaux, de bois d'œuvre, de copeaux, de sciure ou d'autre produit primaire du bois, ou de pâte de bois, à l'exception d'un produit manufacturé en bois.»

ORDERS OF REFERENCE OF THE SENATE

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, November 3, 1980:

"The Senate resumed the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the Government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an Address, with such amendments as the Committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That ten Members of the Senate, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the Senate as members of the Special Joint Committee;

That the Committee have power to appoint from among its members such sub-committees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the Committee be twelve members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.

So it was resolved in the affirmative."

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, November 5, 1980:

"In amendment,

The Honourable Senator Frith moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten:

"That the following Senators be appointed to act on behalf of the Senate on the said Special Joint Committee, namely, the Honourable Senators Asselin, Austin, Connolly, Goldenberg, Hays, Lamontagne, Lucier, Petten, Roblin and Tremblay; and".

The Question then being put on the motion as amended of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., it was—resolved in the affirmative."

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, November 13, 1980:

"With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator Frith moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C.:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in approving the television and radio broadcasting of the proceedings of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada on the basis of the same principles and practice, mutatis mutandis, governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons, including the concept of "electronic Hansard", provided that any subcommittee of the said Committee, shall not be broadcast by television, but shall be broadcast by radio, except the Subcommittee on Agenda, which shall not be broadcast;

That it be an instruction to the Committee that it undertake the aforementioned action as soon as physically possible without disturbing the proceedings of the Committee now undertaken or planned;

That it be an instruction to the Committee that all decisions concerning the implementation of this Order shall be taken only by the Committee's Subcommittee on Agenda; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.

The question being put on the motion, it was—resolved in the affirmative."

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate December 2, 1980:

"With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator Frith moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C.:

That the Senate join with the House of Commons in amending the Order of Reference creating the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada by deleting the words "December 9, 1980" and substituting therefor the words "February 6, 1981"; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

After debate, and

The question being put on the motion, it was—resolved in the affirmative."

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, February 5, 1981:

"With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C. moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That, notwithstanding any previous Order, the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada shall complete its work and make its final report no later than February 13, 1981; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

After debate, and

The question being put on the motion, it was—resolved in the affirmative."

The Clerk of the Senate

ORDERS OF REFERENCE OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, October 23, 1980

RESOLVED,—That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report upon the document entitled "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" published by the Government on October 2, 1980, and to recommend in their report whether or not such an Address, with such amendments as the Committee considers necessary, should be presented by both Houses of Parliament to Her Majesty the Queen;

That 15 Members of the House of Commons to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion be members on the part of this House of the Special Joint Committee;

That the Committee have power to appoint from among its Members such sub-committees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee submit their report not later than December 9, 1980;

That the quorum of the Committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when 6 members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, Members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

Tuesday, October 28, 1980

ORDERED,—That the members designated to serve on the part of this House on the Special Joint Committee to consider a proposed address to Her Majesty the Queen concerning the Constitution of Canada be: Mr. Beatty, Mr. Bockstael, Miss Campbell, Mr. Corbin, Mr. Crombie, Mr. Epp, Mr. Fraser, Mr. Henderson, Mr. Irwin, Mr. Joyal, Mr. Knowles, Mr. Lapierre, Mr. Mackasey, Mr. McGrath and Mr. Nystrom; and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours thereof.

Thursday, November 13, 1980

ORDERED,—That, further to the resolution of this House of January 25, 1977, as subsequently implemented, this House approves the television and radio broadcasting of the proceedings of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution on the basis of the same principles and practice, mutatis mutandis, governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons, including the concept of "electronic Hansard", provided that any subcommittee of the said Committee, shall not be broadcast by television, but shall be broadcast by radio, except the subcommittee on Agenda, which shall not be broadcast;

That it be an instruction to the Committee that it undertake the aforementioned action as soon as physically possible without disturbing the proceedings of the Committee now undertaken or planned;

That it be an instruction to the Committee that all decisions concerning the implementation of this Order shall be taken only by the Committee's subcommittee on Agenda; and ORDERED,—That a Message be sent to the Senate asking Their Honours to unite with this House in the aforementioned actions.

Tuesday, December 2, 1980

ORDERED,—That the Order of Reference creating the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada be amended by deleting the words "December 9, 1980" and substituting therefor the words "February 6, 1981"; and

That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours thereof and to invite them to join with this House in the aforementioned action.

Wednesday, February 4, 1981

ORDERED,—That, notwithstanding any previous Order, the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada shall complete its work and make its final report not later than February 13, 1981; and

That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours thereof.

APPENDIX "D"

This document is a statistical account of the written submissions concerning the "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada"—(1) received by the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution as of 31 December 1980.

There were 323 groups and 639 individuals that made written submissions, for a total of 962.

It should be noted that of the 323 groups, there were 163 groups which submitted briefs, while the submissions of the remaining 160 groups were in the form of a telegram or letter only: many of these telegrams and letters amounted to a simple request to appear. In addition, a considerable number of group submissions seemed to be addressed to one issue, such as those in support of "denominational school rights", "rights of the handicapped", "native rights", "sexual orientation rights", "rights of the unborn child" and "women's rights".

Of the 639 individual submissions, 84 requested to appear only and 17 requested a copy of the Proposed Resolution only. Another 131 individual submissions did not comment on the Proposed Resolution as a whole (Table I), or on any of twenty-three general principles (Table II), or on any section of the Proposed Resolution (Table III). Thus there were a maximum of 409 individual submissions which served as the basis of Tables I, II and III. However it should be noted further that as was the case with group submission, numerous individual submissions were addressed to a single concern.

The document is divided into four Tables. Table I sets out the statistics concerning the Proposed Resolution as a whole. Table II reflects the opinions of groups and individuals concerning twenty-three general principles. Table III contains statistics concerning every section of the Proposed Resolution for which at least one group or individual tendered an opinion. Table IV reveals how many individual submissions were received from each province and territory of Canada.

—1 As introduced by the Prime Minister of Canada on 2 October 1980.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Capital Budget of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation respecting loans and investments for the year ending December 31, 1981, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, as approved by Order in Council P.C. 1981-234, dated January 29, 1981.

Capital Budget of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation respecting furniture, equipment and business premises for the year ending December 31, 1981, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, as approved by Order in Council P.C. 1981-111, dated January 15, 1981.

QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

EXCHANGE VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Would the minister give us the government's account of the present trading value of the Canadian dollar? For the past two days the dollar has traded below 83 cents in relation to the American dollar.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will obtain a detailed answer for my honourable friend. I will make some inquiries of some of the experts in that field to find out exactly why the position changed today.

Senator Doody: As a supplementary, perhaps the honourable minister could, at the same time, explain what appears to me to be something of a contradiction. Today in the other place the Minister of Finance described as "absurd" any suggestion that the government should take steps to cause the dollar to trade in the 87.5 cent range; yet, in the October budget the Minister of Finance predicted that the dollar should or would trade at the 87.5 cent range in 1981. Has there been a change in policy?

Could the minister also find out if it is, indeed, absurd to ask if the government is planning action to reduce the level of inflation to at least the 10 or 10.2 per cent level which was predicted would prevail in 1981?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will obtain a reply to that question. I do not think it is absurd to ask.

ENERGY

SUPPLY AND DEMAND PROJECTIONS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, on January 20 last I asked the Minister of State for Economic Development whether his colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, or a representative of the minister, might appear at the National Energy Board special hearings on energy supply and demand in order to defend the supply and demand forecasts in the Lalonde policy paper, because the Lalonde projections on supply and demand are being assailed from all parts of the industry, the producing provinces, economic commentators and so on.

● (2010)

Virtually no one seems to agree with those forecasts. Most recently, the Canadian Petroleum Association, as the minister is aware, stated at the National Energy Board supply and demand hearings that the Lalonde policy would result in a decrease in Canadian crude oil capacity of 158,000 barrels a day by 1990. They said that this would mean that Canada would be only 55 per cent oil self-sufficient at that date, and that the cost of oil imports would be $182 billion over the decade.

To say that the forecasts made by the Canadian Petroleum Association are spectacularly at variance with those of Mr. Lalonde would be understating the case. I simply ask the minister whether the government has considered having the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources appear before the National Energy Board to defend the projections in his policy paper.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, whether or not that is being considered, I cannot say at the moment. I think that the hearings have been concluded insofar as taking evidence is concerned, although I am not entirely sure of that.

Of course, the projections made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources were based on the assumption that a number of projects would go forward. However, they are now in abeyance. Of course, the projections also included some contribution to the Canadian crude oil supply from such sources as off the east coast. My honourable friend knows that for that to become a reality some additional prospects, and what are now good prospects, need to be confirmed by some of the step-out drilling that is now in progress.

I think we have a right to be optimistic that that will indeed be a major contribution to the Canadian oil supply in this decade. If my honourable friend is more pessimistic about that, I suppose he has that right. Perhaps the CPA took that position.

In dealing with the prospects for exploration and development so that this may be brought on stream, it is easy to find statistical background information that can make you either pessimistic or optimistic, depending on how you choose to view these things.

I do not believe that the supply projected in this decade was the most optimistic that could have been brought in, but certainly it does depend on some significant geological formations turning into successful discoveries.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am not so much pessimistic as I am concerned about the fact that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources claims that his policy will result, by 1990, in Canada being a net exporter of oil, whereas the projections from the industry, in particular the Canadian Petroleum Association, are that as a result of the minister's policy Canada will be only 55 per cent self-sufficient in oil.

GOVERNMENT POLICY—PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY

Hon. Lowell Murray: In view of the exchange between the Minister of State for Economic Development and myself, which I do not wish to pursue on the floor of the Senate—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): At this time.

Senator Murray: —at this time, may I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government whether the government has decided to refer the energy policy of the government to a committee of this chamber, as suggested earlier?

I ask that question again in view of the statements made by the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada yesterday to the effect that Mr. Lalonde's policy makes "heroic assumptions" about the speed and degree of demand for oil in Canada over the next 10 years. I wonder whether we could pursue this matter by way of referring it to a committee of the Senate in the near future.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The energy program will come before Parliament and, therefore, before the Senate in due course, and there will be every opportunity to discuss the matter of energy.

Senator Murray: I do not believe the Leader of the Government understood my question. I put a motion on the order paper asking that energy matters, in general, be referred to a committee of this house. The Deputy Leader of the Government took the adjournment on that matter, but, before doing so, indicated substantial agreement on the proposition that these matters should be discussed in committee. I did not want to press the point while the Senate was preoccupied with the Constitution Committee, but could we have some early action on that front?

Senator Flynn: Is there no answer?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Is it a question?

Senator Flynn: Certainly it is a question. What do you intend to do?

Senator Murray: I want to know if the Deputy Leader of the Government will resume the debate on the motion which he took the adjournment on some weeks ago, and agree to send energy matters to a committee of this house.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on the first part of the question, as to whether I will participate in the debate, I certainly will, and hope to do so, as indicated in the remarks by my honourable friend, as soon as we have disposed of the Constitution question. I cannot say that I will support the idea, but I will certainly make my position very clear—

Senator Flynn: You came very close to it.

Senator Frith: I will make my position very clear on that question when I participate in the debate.

Senator Murray: It is very clear already.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

ON-THE-JOB TRAINING AND IMPORTATION OF SKILLED LABOUR

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. In a speech delivered in my home town of Winnipeg in late January, the minister said that shortages of skilled workers will not be satisfied by immigration, and that companies will themselves have to engage in on-the-job training.

The federal Employment Task Force has since been told by a spokesman for Montreal aerospace industries that those companies are unable to train enough workers to meet the demands of the eighties, and that they will have to recruit workers from Europe.

Did the minister consult the aerospace industry before making his statement?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The honourable senator is asking about a specific industry, namely the aerospace industry, and my remarks were of a more general nature, because there are many, what I call, critical skill shortages that appear to be developing, when we consider the requirements for the enormous growth that will take place in Canada during the 1980s. Some of those will not come up until some time later; some are in the process of development right now.

Therefore, what I was trying to do was to persuade industry to do more. I am not suggesting that they are not doing anything now, but I was trying to persuade industry to accept some of the costs and inconveniences, if that is the right word, to do more on-the-job training. I do not believe that we are going to meet the requirements by the traditional, institutional training methods and the level of apprenticeship and on-the-job training that is in existence now. I also do not believe that we are going to meet many of the critical skill shortages by immigration to the same degree as we have in the past. Perhaps that is equally true of the aerospace industry, although that is not the specific industry I had in mind when I was speaking at this press conference in Winnipeg.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, if I may leave that question of a highly technical nature, which is, in essence, what the minister is saying it is, both labour and management in British Columbia have asserted, regarding the $2.5 billion coal deal with Japan, that many of the 9,000 jobs created as a result of that deal will have to be filled by immigration. That is something not nearly as technical as the aerospace industry.

In light of the minister's statement just now, would he share with us the government's specific plan or activity that would preclude the necessity to look abroad to fill many of these jobs?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the government's position is that the first place we want to look for persons to fill those requirements is the Canadian work force, whether it is the presently unemployed or people entering the market.

The point I was trying to make was that we have to adjust our application of resources, whether financial or otherwise, to turn out great numbers of workers with the required critical skills. I would hope that a large part of the requirement would be met—perhaps for the construction projects, at least, and that is what the northeast British Columbia coal project is going to be—by some form of temporary migration rather than immigration. That is our objective. I hope it succeeds—perhaps not completely, but to a higher degree than is apparent now.

LABOUR

PROPOSED INDUSTRIAL LABOUR MARKET INSTITUTE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Arising from the minister's response to my last question, I wonder if I could draw his attention to a joint statement that I understand has been made by the Canadian Labour Congress and the Business Council on National Issues requesting the federal government to support the creation of an "Industrial Labour Market Institute" to cope with labour shortages, and asking for funds to assist in the setting up of such an organization.

Assuming that the government has the interest that has been expressed by the minister—and I accept that it has—has there been any study done which would indicate that such funding would be advanced in order to set up an institute of that type?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, in the discussions that I have had across the country—and, incidentally, there have been such meetings in each of the provincial capitals that I have visited so far—with senior businessmen, labour unions and provincial governments, we have not offered a significantly higher level of funding for this purpose. What we have asked them is whether or not they could help us devise ways in which they could enthusiastically support making better use of the funding that is now devoted to the necessary training and retraining in order to be able to meet these demands.

That funding, I should tell you, amounts to about $800 million a year from the federal government, and, even so, we do not play the leading role in education, training and retraining, in the technical sense. I think there are some extremely good examples of what is being done by some businesses, supported by their labour unions, and in some cases by the labour unions independently of business, in order to do this job rather effectively. I found no suggestion on the part of labour unions or business that they did not recognize the diagnosis of the problem, or that they rejected some of the suggestions made for resolving it. What we need is a plan of action that they will all enthusiastically support. If this is done, then I think the magnitude of the problems will be lessened considerably.

Senator Nurgitz: I take it, then, that the specific response with regard to the funding of this Industrial Labour Market Institute is that it will not be funded by the federal government.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I thought I had made it clear that in the course of my discussions across the country I did not offer any additional funding. What I did was to ask whether we could make more effective use of the present spending, which, by the way, is rather substantial, as regards turning out the required additional numbers of critical skills.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT—SHORTAGE OF TALENT

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: One final human resources question, honourable senators, if I may, which I would like to address to the minister.

The Minister of State for Science and Technology recently announced that the government's objective of spending 1.5 per cent of the gross national product on research and development has been delayed until 1985 from 1983.

Is the minister aware that the President of the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council has said that the critical shortage of research talent may prevent Canada from achieving that goal? If the minister is so aware, would he share with us the government's specific plans for ensuring that the number of trained research workers will be such, by 1985, that the government will not be able to blame any failure to reach the target on the absence of a competent labour force?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, an objective analysis of the amount of additional funding of research and development, not only by the federal government but by other levels of government and by the private sector, leads us to believe that the 1.5 per cent level, as a combination of those three, will indeed be reached by the end of 1985. I think it is fair to say that it will perhaps be exceeded by that time, because there are some elements of research and development that we think ought to be added, such as marketing structures along the way, at the same time as technical problems are being worked out. I suppose it is purely a matter of opinion, but my opinion is—and I believe it is a fairly objective and well-informed opinion—that we will reach that objective.

THE CONSTITUTION

AMENDMENTS PROPOSED BY WOMEN'S CONFERENCE

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is for the government leader. This past weekend, an important delegation of women from all the provinces and the Northwest Territories were called by the Advisory Council on the Status of Women to a meeting in Ottawa to discuss the constitutional future of the Council in the light of constitutional changes. This large group of women passed several resolutions asking for the Charter of Rights to include legal recognition of their group.

For instance, it was suggested to the Minister of Justice that the Charter of Rights be discussed in Canada by a constituent assembly so that this important section of the Canadian electorate could express its views and state its rights.

In the wake of this important conference, will the government and in particular the Minister of Justice accept to include in the Charter of Rights some of the recommendations of that group.

● (2025)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the recommendations which were produced by that women's conference, of course, are being studied very carefully by the government at the present time.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Will the government take a decision about their claims before the close of the constitutional debate which began today in the House of Commons and which will soon get under way in the Senate?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice and further information will be sought on that point. Interestingly enough, when the Right Honourable the Prime Minister suggested in the other place that the government may well be prepared to adopt the recommendations of the women's conference if the official opposition expresses support for the effort to enshrine a truly great Charter of Rights, his offer was totally rejected. Perhaps the spokesman for the opposition in this chamber will explain the inexplicable.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I would not think that the Leader of the Government would dare venture on such slippery ground. I fully appreciate why the opposition leader and his supporters refused to negotiate women's rights in exchange for other concessions the government might offer them about the constitutional repatriation.

I think the government in office is not being brave and courageous when it asks that members of the opposition assume its responsibilities. The government must be able to shoulder its responsibilities and then ask us to judge its decisions.

In any event, if that is what the government wants we in the official opposition have already taken our responsibilities. We are still capable of doing so. But I am saying that the argument just raised by the Leader of the Government is the weakest we can hear in this debate—asking the opposition to decide for the government.

[English]

Senator Buckwold: This is a speech. Why don't you ask a question?

Senator Asselin: I am coming to the question because he did not answer my question. He only made comments about what I said before.

Senator Frith: He said he would take your question as notice and he would get the information.

Senator Flynn: No, no, no.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I will go further. Considering that perhaps my question was too difficult for the Leader of the Government, I will put it in a simpler form.

In order to release the existing tension between the Advisory Council on the Status of Women and the minister responsible for that advisory council, the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, and to restore peace within that organization, does the government intend to have that group report directly to Parliament instead of leaning on the mercy of a minister who is using his political power to pressure it?

● (2030)

[English]

Senator Perrault: As I stated a few moments ago, the recommendations of that conference will be considered carefully by the government, but, honourable senators, the amendments which were produced by the government represent a substantial advance for the women of Canada. No one suggests that the amendments represent perfection, but the former chairman of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, Doris Anderson, spoke in most glowing terms about these amendments prior to her resignation. I think even yet she must admit the amendments represent substantial progress.

Senator Asselin: Then why did she resign?

Senator Perrault: To paraphrase her remarks, she said that these amendments represent great progress for the women of Canada. The government is sympathetic to improving the situation of the women in this country. If these further ideas have merit, they will certainly be given serious consideration.

ENERGY

QUEBEC AND MARITIMES PIPELINE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have seven delayed answers to questions which I would ask the chamber to take as read. I will simply identify the questions.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised on January 28 by Senator Muir concerning the Quebec and Maritimes pipeline.

The honourable senator will note that there is a firm commitment in the national energy program to extend the gas pipeline to the maritimes (by 1983) and west to Vancouver Island. To this end, the government has indicated that it will set aside up to $500 million to be used, if required, to support these undertakings. The competitive pricing of gas relative to oil, coupled with conversion grants, should provide additional incentives to extend the gas distribution system.

With respect to the status of applications before the National Energy Board, I wish to inform the honourable member that Trans Quebec and maritimes (TQM) has made application to extend the gas pipeline from Quebec to the maritimes. The NEB has set March 10, 1981 as the date for hearings on the supply and requirements portion of the application. Hearings on other elements of the application, including financial, environmental and technical, will be scheduled as additional information requested by the Board is available. The duration of the hearings will be affected accordingly.

In conclusion, I would reiterate that the federal government considers construction of this pipeline to be of the utmost importance and hopes to see progress on the pipeline advance quickly.

OIL—POTENTIAL SHORTAGE IN EASTERN CANADA

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised on January 20 by Senator Donahoe concerning a potential oil shortage in eastern Canada.

I am informed that Mexico was forced to reduce crude oil exports in late 1980 and early 1981 due to severe weather conditions which affected crude oil production and created lengthy delays at loading terminals. This lower level of crude exports affected not only PetroCanada's contracted volumes but also all other Mexican oil purchasers. Such interruptions are not uncommon and most refiners' supply logistics do take them into account. Pemex, Mexico's national oil company, is currently working to overcome these technical difficulties and is hopeful of allowing companies to resume full liftings shortly.

In the meantime, offshore crude supplies into eastern Canada appear to be generally satisfactory and, compared to total eastern Canadian imports, the volume lost is relatively small. To date, refiners have not experienced difficulties in adjusting to the Mexican interruption.

Furthermore, I would like to add that the government regards the oil industry as being responsible for assuring oil product supply to Canadian consumers. If there are breakdowns in supply or refinery systems, then more crude and/or petroleum products can be imported to ensure domestic needs are met. Canada is not isolated from the international oil market; the oil refining and marketing industry is in a profitable phase, and there is no reason for it not to maintain its continuous record of assuring supply to the Canadian market.

FINANCE

CANADA SAVINGS BONDS—INTEREST RATE AND REDEMPTIONS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on January 29 by Senator Charbonneau concerning redemption of Canada Savings Bonds.

(The answer follows:)

I wish to inform the honourable senator that the government is continuously monitoring the level of Canada Savings Bond redemptions and any changes in rates payable on competing savings instruments. While the level of current redemptions is high, no decision has been taken to revise the yield on CSBs. The government's CSB policy remains one of ensuring that investors receive a fair rate of return while minimizing, as much as possible, the burden of debt charges from this form of financing on the taxpayer.

In the present situation the rates payable on some very short-term savings instruments are, indeed, higher than CSB rates. However, the rates payable on CSBs are guaranteed for a full seven-year term, whereas these other rates, such as those presently payable on bank non-chequable savings accounts, fall quickly when interest rates decline. Furthermore, CSBs can be cashed without interest penalty at any time. Because of tne attractive unique features of CSBs, the government cannot be expected to pay the same rates at all times as are available on either less liquid instruments or those which pay a guaranteed rate over a very short period of time.

Honourable senators, I have a response to a supplementary question by Senator Murray concerning Canada Savings Bonds.

(The answer follows:)

I am informed that net redemptions of Canada Savings Bonds during the fiscal year up to the end of January amounted to about $1.2 billion. Based on recent redemption levels, it is possible that net redemptions of CSBs during fiscal 1980-81 could amount to $2 billion. To date, however, the government has been successful in refinancing such redemptions through treasury bills and Government of Canada marketable bonds.

ENERGY

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF PETROFINA CANADA INC.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to questions raised by Senators Doody, Roblin, Manning and Donahoe on February 11 concerning the purchase of Petrofina by Petro-Canada.

(The answer follows:)

Petrofina is a fully integrated company comprising activities in exploration, development, production, refining and retailing.

Petro-Canada, based on its assessment of the worth of Petrofina, has concluded that $120 per share is an appropriate amount. While the details of this assessment must remain confidential, Petro-Canada's track record in acquiring other companies—for example, Pacific Petroleum and Atlantic Richfield—is a good one and the corporation has earned the confidence of government and the people of Canada.

The assets of Petrofina being acquired by Petro-Canada will complement the existing assets of Petro-Canada in important ways. For example, the 1,100 retail outlets in Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes will round out existing regional retail markets. Other assets to be acquired include a 5 per cent interest in Syncrude, production of about 21,000 barrels per day of oil and 82,000,000 cubic feet per day of gas for a total production in barrels of oil equivalent to about 31.6 thousand barrels per day. Petrofina also owns a refinery near Montreal with a capacity of about 90,000 barrels per day and has an interest in Panarctic. Adding this production to Petro-Canada's existing production base would make Petro-Canada the fifth largest hydrocarbon producer in Canada.

STRAIT OF CANSO—POTENTIAL SITE OF NATURAL GAS LIQUEFACTION TERMINAL

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised on February 12 by Senator Muir concerning the potential site of a natural gas liquefaction terminal.

I am informed there is at the present time an application before the National Energy Board which deals with this matter. The Board has yet to set a date for hearing this application. I regret that I am unable to provide the honourable senator with further details.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

GYPSUM EXPORTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on February 11 by Senator Muir concerning the gypsum industry.

(The answer follows:)

Gypsum deposits are common in many areas in North America. I am informed that in Canada—in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, in particular—large deposits of gypsum can be found. Most of these deposits are recovered from open pit mines and shipped in their raw form down the coast of eastern U.S.A. markets. The advantages of large deposits, open pit mines, and easy transportation result in a marginal price advantage for our Canadian producers. The absence of tariffs on raw gypsum also assists producers in maintaining this price advantage.

If Canadian producers decided to export a finished product, it is felt that they would lose the advantages of selling raw gypsum. Since raw gypsum is available in many areas, it is thought that buyers would turn to local suppliers, if there were no price advantage and, therefore no reason to buy Canadian.

PUBLIC WORKS

TERMINATION OF COMMUNITY SERVICES CONTRIBUTION PROGRAM—EFFECT ON WINNIPEG

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, several questions have been raised both inside and outside the chamber concerning the termination of the Community Services Contribution Program known as CSCP. The question was asked in a formal manner by Senator Roblin on December 3, 1980. I apologize for the length of time it has taken to prepare an official reply.

The decision not to renew the program was taken in the context of the government's desire to maintain expenditures at an appropriate portion of the national income. I can assure the honourable senator that the decision was a difficult one, and was only taken after a careful consideration of certain fundamental factors.

First, there was the question of whether it was appropriate for the federal government to continue funding the provision of services that from a jurisdictional point of view have been the responsibility of the provinces and municipalities. It is not a matter of whether the program was good, but rather who should pay for such a program. Second, there is the issue of accountability—whether the government responsible for raising resources through taxation should not also be responsible for the expenditure of such revenues. Third, the effectiveness of the program was analyzed from the point of view of job generation and compared with other programs that demonstrate a better return for money spent.

Moreover, the present climate of fiscal restraint contributed to this decision. In meeting the objective of providing more effective government, the continuation of existing programs has been studied with a view to providing funds for new programs, or to those of higher priority. The decision not to renew the Community Services Contribution Program now results in more funds being available for addressing higher priorities in the fiscal year 1982-1983.

Honourable senators, under CSCP, the federal government has allocated a total of $400 million for municipal capital projects: $150 million for the 1979 program year and $250 million for 1980. Over 3,000 projects in some 1,000 communities from coast to coast will have received federal assistance. This is a significant contribution to the provision of local services to Canadians in every province.

Although no further commitments will be made under the program after the 1980 program year, federal funds will flow to the provinces until March 31, 1982. There is a common misconception on this particular point. It is not an abrupt cutoff as of the end of 1980. In this regard I can assure you that the government will meet all commitments under the present federal-provincial CSCP agreements. As you are aware, concerns have been raised about the time available for the use of the 1980 program year funds. As I mentioned, the funding is scheduled to terminate at the end of March 1982. However, the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation is seeking an extension of even that date, to enable communities the time to incur the necessary expenditures. He is confident that this extension will be granted, on the understanding that fiscal expenditures in 1981-1982 will be reduced to reflect expenditures to be made in 1982-1983.

Honourable senators, I apologize for the length of the reply, but this is very important to many communities in this country and I felt that these facts should be placed on the record.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR DELAY OF DEBATE ON RESOLUTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Leave having been given to proceed to Motion No. 2:

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition), pursuant to notice of Friday, February 13, 1981, moved:

> That the Senate do not consider approval of the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, or the resolution based on that report before the House of Commons has disposed of them.

He said: Honourable senators, I imagine that I must speak in favour of this motion since—

Senator Perrault: Not necessarily.

Senator Olson: No, you are not in favour of it.

Senator Flynn: If you say that you agree with the motion, I will resume my seat right now. The motion speaks for itself. Last Saturday morning I had forgotten about the matter, deciding to prepare later whatever I would say tonight. While reading the Gazette of Saturday, February 14, I noticed an article entitled: "Constitution in home stretch before London trip." I quote from that article:

> A parallel debate in the Senate is expected to be shorter and more peaceful. As committee co-chairman Senator Harry Hays (Liberal-Alberta) told a press conference yesterday: "Our people are pretty well in favor of the package and seeing as we're a long way from the bathroom facilities, I think that those in the opposition—looking at their age—I think we'll whip them pretty fast."

That article did not make me very optimistic as to the result of my motion. Now, I know that Senator Hays, the joint chairman of the committee, has had problems because sometimes he speaks before he thinks.

Senator Muir: He has problems with many things.

Senator Olson: Also a high level of success.

Senator Flynn: I thought it was rather amusing. However, we will see as we proceed with this debate whether Senator Hays' opinion is the opinion of the government or of the majority in this house supporting the government.

[Translation]

There are three main reasons why my motion should be passed. First, the precedents. Second, the importance of the matter. Third, it is a strategic problem for the Senate—not for the political parties but for the Senate.

As for the precedents—

Senator Lamontagne: What is the fourth one. You said there were four.

Senator Flynn: No, I said there were three.

Senator Asselin: Wait a minute, there is perhaps a fourth one.

Senator Flynn: The fourth point will perhaps be made by Senator Lamontagne when he will support my proposal.

I return to the matter of precedents. I may have erred—and it can happen to me, Senator Lamontagne, if you can imagine that! However, since the Statute of Westminster, the only point that seems important to me is that if we left in London in 1931 the responsibility of any legislation amending our Constitution, it was at the request of the provinces. This is history. However, some amendments were made to the Constitution when unemployment insurance was implemented, and they were approved by the provinces who wanted to give up that burden. Now, this is not the problem, it has been passed by the Senate and the House of Commons.

But let us talk about 1949 which, in my opinion, is the important point in constitutional amendment debate. Since then, the only part of our Constitution which still remains the responsibility of Westminster is the part that concerns both the provinces and the federal government. In 1949, we patriated all the provisions that dealt exclusively with the federal government. I think that even as far as the 1949 amendment is concerned—unless I am mistaken, I did not have time to check that particular case—Mr. St. Laurent said that it had nothing to do with the provinces, but that the federal government and Parliament were exclusively concerned.

Senator Lamontagne: That is not what your party said at the time.

Senator Flynn: Maybe not, but it should be noted, as Senator Lamontagne will certainly remember, that the Premier of Nova Scotia, Mr. MacDonald, was not very happy with this amendment, and neither was Mr. Duplessis. And that is why we have section 91.1 which is very exclusive and which states that what remains over there is what concerns provincial governments and legislatures, as well as the conditions which affect the two levels of government. I think that during an earlier debate, I mentioned that when Mr. St. Laurent had applied to Westminster for this change, he had thought—and that is the opinion expressed by Mr. Pickersgill in his book entitled My Years with Mr. St. Laurent—that all subsequent change would require the unanimous support of the provinces. He felt that it had not been necessary then, because his application dealt only with the patriation of the part of the Constitution which is the exclusive responsibility of the federal government.

In any case, from that moment on, we have the following precedents: in 1951, section 94.A dealing with old age security pensions, and this amendment as passed by the House of Commons on May 5, 1951, and later by the Senate on May 8, had been introduced first of all as an Address. But they had taken the trouble, as suggested then by Senator Hugessen, to print as an annex to the official report the correspondence exchanged between the federal and provincial governments to make sure that it met with the approval of the provinces.

In any case, what I want to say is that this was passed first by the House of Commons, and later by the Senate; it was not done simultaneously.

Then, in 1960, there was section 99.1 concerning the retirement age for judges. This amendment was approved by the House of Commons; the Address was approved on June 14, and it was only on July 13 that the Senate approved it, after making an amendment. I believe that Senator Croll was there at the time. The Senate amended the resolution by removing the reference to county or district judges and restricting the amendment to superior court judges. Therefore, this did not occur at the same time, but later on, and the Senate amended the Address and referred it back to the house, which accepted the amendment.

In 1964, another amendment was made to section 94.A concerning supplementary benefits and survivor entitlements for old age pensions. This amendment—it was, of course, highly technical—was passed more quickly as it was approved by the House of Commons on June 19, and by the Senate later the same day.

There is therefore no precedent for a concurrent discussion on an Address to Westminster to amend the Constitution. There is no precedent for a simultaneous discussion in both houses. Generally, the procedure is for the House of Commons to say "we" and to leave a blank space so that the words "the Senate and" can be added to the "we", meaning the House of Commons, "requesting that Her Majesty lay before the Parliament a measure hereinafter set forth—"

Senator Frith: But because of your motion, we are not having a simultaneous discussion.

Senator Flynn: I do not understand what you mean.

Senator Frith: Our discussion is not starting at the same time as in the House of Commons because we are now discussing your motion.

Senator Flynn: This is hair-splitting. Once again, if you want to accept my motion, I shall sit down immediately. He was suggesting that we would start on Thursday, when the debate in the House of Commons will go on for weeks. We would therefore be having simultaneous debates in both houses on the same address.

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Flynn: You were saying that we are not discussing the Address this evening at the same time as the other place and that we are therefore not having simultaneous debates.

Senator Frith: If that is the case, I do not understand what you are getting at.

Senator Flynn: I think that your point was too subtle and perhaps not really relevant in these circumstances.

Senator Frith: Are the precedents of 1951 and 1960 the only two you found? For my part, I found four earlier ones starting with 1940.

Senator Flynn: Yes, I am aware that there were four before that. But there were two decisions concerning only a distribution of seats which were highly technical. In any event, I believe that since 1931 there have not been simultaneous debates.

Senator Frith: In what sense?

Senator Flynn: In the sense that the Senate was invited to approve the Address once it had been adopted by the House of Commons. It is in that sense that I drafted my motion. Here is what I am saying: let us wait until the House of Commons has disposed of the proposed resolution or the proposed Address before we debate it here; that is my proposal. I think it seems obvious that that is what I am proposing, unless I am deluding myself. I do not know, but naturally I thought I was dealing with at least grade 10 students, not grade 2—

• (2050)

Senator Riel: You do not seem to be very convinced.

Senator Flynn: With you it is difficult to be convincing in any case, but that is the least of my worries.

Senator Molgat: As a teacher or as a student?

Senator Flynn: As a teacher I would always follow your example; only Senator Molgat with his tender and flute-like voice is typical of a primary school teacher.

Now having said that—I wonder if Senator Riel wants to say something to me?

Senator Riel: We understand what you want; you want it to be subsequent, not concomitant?

Senator Flynn: Right on.

Senator Riel: Is that what you mean?

Senator Flynn: I thought everybody had understood, especially a well-informed lawyer like you, Senator Riel. You are used to pleading cases, it is not necessary to dot all the i's for a man of your intellectual calibre. So, who else now has something to say?

Senator Asselin: I believe Senator Denis wants to say something.

Senator Denis: Come to the point!

Senator Flynn: I have just explained to you that the precedents suggest that the Senate ought to consider this type of resolution and this type of Address only after the House of Commons is through with it.

Senator Denis: There have been others as well according to Senator Frith. There have been other cases when it was debated at the same time.

Senator Flynn: No, not a single one.

Senator Asselin: No, that is not the way you see it.

Senator Flynn: According to the research I made, there is not a single one. The only one which comes very close is the address dealt with in 1964. That Address was passed by the House of Commons on June 19 and the Senate passed it a few hours later. The Senate received the message and did pass the Address.

In those days, in almost every case, very technical problems were involved and this brings me to my second point. Today we do not have before us a matter which is as limited or as easy to consider as those we had previously. Here we are dealing with very fundamental amendments to the Constitution.

According to the Prime Minister, this is the beginning of a new era. Canada has at last its own Constitution, imagine! All we are repatriating after all is that part of the Constitution which concerns the provinces and not the federal government. Secondly, we have the Charter of Rights. That is another problem, namely entrenchment. It does not solve the fundamental problem we have been discussing for years, which is the division of powers. When people suggest—and here, of course, I am a little off the subject but I was pushed into it—when people suggest that this proposal is in response to the referendum in Quebec, I tell you frankly that patriation of the Constitution and the Charter of Rights are the least of concerns of Quebecers who were rather counting on a redistribution of powers. At all events, we shall discuss that matter in due course because as regards the problems which arise concerning our federation—and that is why that province is currently opposed to the federal appeal to Westminster—we have a very important question, of course. Furthermore, it is very controversial. For example, the proceedings and the work of the joint committee indicate that a host of views were expressed, and that differences in views are focused on the central point of unilateral action. Concerning the unilateral action of both the government and the federal Parliament, the views expressed reveal that 33 groups out of 56 expressed their disagreement whereas 23 were in agreement. Some 42 out of 134 individuals who expressed their views agree whereas 92 disagree.

So this is indeed a very controversial issue. Strategically, the debate which is under way in the other place may bring about certain changes.

I do not know whether it was Senator Olson who said a while ago, "Oh yes?" I am interested in that answer. You agree that there can be changes?

Senator Asselin: No, there will not be any.

Senator Flynn: So it is decided, there will not be any.

Senator Asselin: That is even worse.

Senator Flynn: That is your opinion, Senator Olson, you think there will not be any.

[English]

Senator Olson: I was not commenting on what you were saying.

Senator Perrault: We are just listening.

Senator Flynn: Not very well. In any event, it does not matter.

[Translation]

There may be amendments because there were suggestions to that effect yesterday in the other place. Tonight also, Senator Asselin asked the government leader questions on the requests made by the Women's Advisory Council. The answer was similar to the one the Prime Minister gave yesterday, namely that if the opposition is willing to compromise, the government may grant some of the requests. As some have said, this is really some sort of horse-trading. One cannot deal in this way with fundamental rights.

But, what if Mr. Trudeau makes concessions to this group as he did with the NDP, or with Mr. Davis or others just to get what he wants, that is to get his package accepted like he did with the Senate. He did repeal clause 44 to buy off the Senate; what if he does the same with other provisions of the proposed charter. It might help for the Senate to be made aware of it before there is a confrontation or a fight with the House of Commons. It would be logical for the Senate to consider this resolution of vital importance to the future of Canada only when it knows exactly what the government is driving at, and whether or not the House of Commons is willing to agree to it. We would therefore be able in the Senate to reach a decision in relative peace and quiet and not by exchanging opinions with the other house. That danger is very real if the debate is to proceed simultaneously in the Senate and the House of Commons.

Since it is suggested that the Senate is to reform itself, since we have received the report of the special committee, since we have had all those suggestions about the role of the Senate, I should like to see the Senate really proceed to reform as suggested, and as expected, in order to deserve the confidence the government was forced to show in it by withdrawing Section 44 which would have allowed the House of Commons to abolish the Senate unilaterally, through a simple decision in the other place that would not have required our approval but would have been confirmed by the other place 90 days later.

I feel we must show, without delay, that we can assume our responsibilities. And the way to do so is to wait till we know exactly what the House of Commons or the government has decided to do in the other place. We can then discuss the matter soberly, responsibly, efficiently, and thereby show that this institution really deserves to survive.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, all members of this chamber have listened with a great deal of interest to the arguments advanced by the distinguished Leader of the Opposition in explaining the reasons which prompted him to move the motion which we are now debating. I suppose what Senator Flynn has really said to us is that we are the house of "sober second thought", that traditionally the Senate is a body which is supposed to reflect on actions taken previously in the other place. In effect, he suggests that honourable senators, in their wisdom, should act to make changes only after the members of the Commons have debated and voted.

It is true that one of the valuable functions of the Senate is to exercise its judgment with respect to the measures sent to it by the other place. The Senate has done that countless times. Honourable senators know better than anyone in this country of the numerous changes in legislation which are the result of official and unofficial work by the Senate—work in the chamber and outside of it. Honourable senators are aware of this process which often sees a minister contacted after a bill comes to us from the other place. The minister is taken into a process of consultation, and ways in which a bill can be improved are often suggested to that minister. This process is a Senate technique—a good and useful tradition. Many worthwhile legislative changes have come about as a result of this process. On many occasions—more often than the critics of the Senate are prepared to admit or, perhaps, know of—the Senate has improved proposed legislation. In this respect, the Senate has proved its worth time and time again.

Some honourable senators may feel persuaded initially to support the view advanced by the Honourable Senator Flynn this evening. Some may sympathize with the view that in the case of these very important constitutional proposals—some of the most important measures ever to be brought before Parliament—it may be a particularly appropriate time for a process of "sober second thought," with debate and decision in the other place before we discuss it here. However, surely there is a fundamental difference between the normal procedure followed regarding a bill which has been debated in the other place, referred to committee, given third reading and passed, and then sent to the Senate to be considered by us, and the procedure which the government has proposed for the consideration of the resolution recommended by the joint committee's report, that great report which was produced as a result, in significant part, of the efforts of many members of this chamber. Does "sober second thought" suggest that all measures should be introduced only in the other place, and that only after the Commons has disposed of them should they be sent to the Senate for detailed study, debate and possible amendment? Surely that is a narrow interpretation of "sober second thought." Isn't "sober second thought," as it applies to the Senate, really a state of mind? Is it not an attitude?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, come on!

Senator Perrault: Yes, is it not really an attitude, an attitude which says: "Look here, now, however this measure comes before us, regardless of the formal time schedule, we are going to take a conscientious, reflective attitude towards the quality of what we do in Parliament. If possible, we shall improve those measures which come before us"?

Whether we have concurrent debate or sequential debate, whether a bill originates in the Senate and then goes to the House of Commons, or vice versa—

Senator Flynn: Technically.

Senator Perrault: —the determination to do our work in respect of a bill or a resolution in a conscientious and effective manner is of fundamental importance.

"Sober second thought," in that sense, has little to do with formal time allocation, or whether we receive bills or resolutions from the other place, or whether they originate here, or whether we debate sequentially or concurrently.

There is something very different, indeed, unique about these constitutional proposals. Here is not a normal "housekeeping" bill which has been dealt with in some sort of limited fashion by members of the other place—a bill which has been adopted after two or three hours of debate and then sent to the Senate.

In this chamber the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution was tabled the other day. Has there ever been a joint committee in the history of Parliament which has seen a more united and concerted effort by parliamentarians from both chambers to do something beneficial for this country? I think not.

Senator Flynn: What do you mean by "united"?

Senator Perrault: Parliamentarians of all parties united in a concern and endeavour to abide by the highest parliamentary principles. That is what I mean.

Honourable senators, I freely acknowledge the contribution made by the official opposition in this process. They did a splendid job, according to their own lights, insights and instincts. I think the same can be said for all parties on the Hill.

The report was produced as a result of 106 meetings of a joint committee composed of representatives of this chamber and the other place; 260 hours of committee time directed towards the study of these constitutional proposals; with 51 honourable senators having participated in that committee's deliberations. I remember the debate of many weeks ago at which time it was alleged that only a limited number of carefully selected senators would be allowed to serve on that committee and that—

Senator Flynn: To vote.

Senator Perrault: —there was an attempt by the government to restrict freedom of speech. By the time the committee had concluded its deliberations, 51 senators from both sides of the chamber had, at one time or another, served on it with distinction. Let us acknowledge that. This was an exercise of parliamentary democracy of a type we have rarely seen in the nation's capital.

Over 90 hours were spent on the clause-by-clause study alone of the resolution, and over 130 members of the other place contributed at some point to the hearings as committee members. In other words, a total of almost 190 parliamentarians from the other place and this chamber had the opportunity at one time or another to serve on that committee, and many others attended the committee meetings as observers. Never in parliamentary history have matters related to the Constitution been the subject of such close and detailed scrutiny.

Those honourable senators who believe—and I think quite correctly—in the concept of the Senate as the chamber of sober second thought can feel reassured that a great deal of thought has already been given by members of both houses of Parliament to the subject of patriation of the Constitution and constitutional change. Indeed, the time for sober second thought is not later—it is now. My concern, honourable senators, is that should we adopt this motion tonight, and should we concur in the idea that the constitutional proposals should be debated and decided later by the Senate, that there should be a sequential process that would see the measure debated first in the Commons, I think the Senate could well earn a reputation on this vital issue as the "body of afterthought".

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: Conceivably, many important decisions could be made before the Senate had an opportunity to enter into an adequate dialogue with the members of the other place. Surely, concurrent debate would be vastly preferable with continuing day-by-day communication established between the two houses—and a sharing of constructive ideas.

Are there procedural deficiencies? Senator Flynn states he has been looking into the record. Certainly precedent indicates that the government is on good ground in proposing this concurrent procedure—the idea of having separate but similar resolutions in the Senate and in the Commons on a matter of joint concern to the two houses.

Senator Flynn: I did not say "separate."

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there is one 1960 precedent.

Senator Flynn: If you say 1960, you are wrong.

Senator Perrault: Senator Flynn should remember 1960 very well. He was Deputy Speaker and surely he cannot have forgotten the events that began on June 14, 1960.

Senator Flynn: It was passed in the house on June 14, 1960. It was sent on July 13.

Senator Perrault: He made reference to it, but what he failed to mention was that when the Commons, on June 14, 1960, passed this resolution, it was rescinded on July 29 because after the Commons had dealt with it on June 14, it went to the Senate and it was amended on July 13—

Senator Flynn: Sure.

Senator Perrault: —and changes were then required. Then it went back to the Commons, where there was a great deal of parliamentary disruption as a result of that process.

Senator Flynn: You don't want that to happen again.

Senator Perrault: How much better the process could have been had there been a concurrent debate at that time—

Senator Flynn: Please. Spare us.

Senator Perrault: —where an opportunity would have been provided for the two chambers to maintain communications and to determine concurrently at that time to produce the ultimate amendment. Information could have been communicated from one chamber to the other and the amending action could have been taken virtually simultaneously in both houses without the substantial parliamentary disruption which occurred.

Senator Flynn: I am sorry, but that is not what took place. I think you should look at the record.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have the record here.

Senator Flynn: There was an amendment by the Senate after the house had disposed of it, and then it was sent back to the house.

Senator Perrault: That is exactly what I said. May I just give the sequence of dates again. On June 14, 1960—and presumably Senator Flynn was there as a member of the other place—

Senator Flynn: Sure I was.

Senator Perrault: —it was passed by the Commons.

Senator Flynn: You are confusing the issue.

Senator Perrault: On July 13 the Senate amended the resolution which had been introduced here.

Senator Flynn: It had been passed by the House of Commons first, and then sent here.

Senator Perrault: Then the Commons was required to rescind on July 29, and the resolution, as amended, was passed in the Commons.

Senator Flynn: Yes, that is right.

Senator Perrault: The suggestion that I advance and, obviously, Senator Flynn rejects the idea, is that if there had been concurrent debate—

Senator Flynn: It would not have happened.

Senator Perrault: —the procedural difficulty that occurred at that time would not have taken place.

Senator Flynn: There was no difficulty.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there are a number of other cases that I think might be cited in the course of this debate—

Senator Flynn: Try again.

Senator Perrault: —to reinforce this point of view.

Senator Flynn: You'd better try again.

Senator Perrault: Surely there would be value in having both houses debate the constitutional proposals over the same time period. Should the Senate, for example, debate the motion following adoption of a resolution in the other place, amendments by the Senate different from those made in the Commons would, procedurally, complicate the entire amending process. The Commons would be required to rescind its resolution and begin the debate all over again.

Senator Flynn: Just imagine the tragedy.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I listened very carefully to Senator Flynn's remarks, and I would ask the same courtesy of having these arguments heard.

Thirdly, without question, sequential rather than concurrent debate in the Senate and the Commons would be extremely time-consuming in light of the very heavy legislative timetable. Time and time again we have been reminded in this debate, and during the debate in the other place, that the goverment should really get on with the task of looking at unemployment, inflation, trade, budgetary matters and energy considerations. The Prime Minister and the government have been accused of spending too much time on the Constitution and taking up too much parliamentary time on this subject. While it is necessary to devote ample time to the subject of patriation and other constitutional proposals, we believe, along with the opposition, that we should proceed as soon as possible with consideration of many key matters which require attention. Speaking for the government, may I say that we are prepared to proceed with a backlog of very important legislation as soon as this constitutional proposal is disposed of by Parliament.

The point that the government makes is that concurrent debate in the Commons and the Senate would be time efficient without in any way affecting the parliamentary prerogatives of any honourable senator. We do not have time allocation in the Senate. We do not intend to introduce it. We do not have closure. Honourable senators are going to have a full opportunity to debate this matter.

The method of proceeding then, I believe, is efficient. It will give parliamentarians in both houses an opportunity to present amendments, and it will employ parliamentary time to its maximum advantage in the public interest.

Honourable senators, may I remind you of another consideration which is of significance. I touched upon this just a moment ago. The process of concurrent debate would allow for informal consultation between both houses during the course of that debate. I believe that would be a very useful procedure. It would be possible then for a valuable amendment to be adopted in the Senate, and then to be advanced in the other place, and adopted there, if both houses were still in the process of concurrent debate. Otherwise, the parliamentary procedures would be very time consuming as honourable senators are aware.

Sequential debate could create the enormously time consuming complication of one house or the other called upon to rescind its resolution in order to consider, and possibly to accommodate, amendments adopted by the other chamber. I have mentioned already what happened in 1960 and the experience of the Leader of the Opposition at that time.

Senator Flynn: It was a good one.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if the Senate were to debate the resolution and to vote after the Commons, this body would lose an optimum opportunity to bring influence to bear upon the House of Commons debate. Surely, this is a relevant point. If this measure comes to the Senate after the House of Commons has already dealt with it, and after the relevant processes have been completed in that chamber, what realistic opportunities remain for the Senate measurably to affect the thinking of the Commons?

Finally, honourable senators, the procedure the government proposes constitutes, in my view, the most direct way of dealing with the report of the special joint committee. The time for sober second thought, I suggest, is now: after 31 honourable senators have participated in the debate in this chamber on the question of referring the constitutional proposals to a joint committee; after 106 meetings of the special joint committee have been held; after 267 hours have been spent, during which time a total of 51 senators have participated. I think we should be prepared, without delay, to consider the resolution which has been recommended by that joint committee. As I have said, surely, if we wait until those in the other place complete their debate and vote, we risk being considered as a "house of afterthought" rather than as a body of "sober second thought".

However well-intentioned the resolution by Senator Flynn may be, I urge you to reject the motion before you.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, after listening to the speech made by the Leader of the Government, I realize that the important debate to come is not getting off to a good start, and yet the motion presented by the Leader of the Opposition is a reasonable one. It is supported by the precedents I will quote in my speech and which in my opinion preserve the meaning and the essence of the Senate, the very reason why it was created as the second chamber of Parliament.

However, before coming to that point, the question which is raised, not only in the Senate and in the other place but also among the public is why are we rushed that way? We, from the opposition, have had the same experience in committee. Every single day—and Senator Tremblay could vouch for that as could other senators who attended the sittings of the joint committee—every single day we had to fight to get the majority to understand that we needed more time to study in more depth the document before us and also to give all groups coming from everywhere in Canada the opportunity to state their views before the committee. We had to fight every step of the way to get new delays, and today we are still facing the same situation, we still have to fight to make the point that going about it this way, i.e. studying this document concurrently with the House of Commons, does not do the Canadian people any good. Why do so? I would like an answer to my question. Why, honourable senators, are we rushed again? Why are we asked not to proceed as we usually do, as we have done for so many years, i.e. study legislation from the House of Commons once it has been adopted there? I thought the Leader of the Government would give us sound reasons saying: "Here is the government's timetable, we have to do it that way because of urgent legislation that needs to be passed." Of course they talked about inflation, unemployment, the economy. Well, during the two or three months we spent considering the proposed resolution in committee, the government could have brought legislation before the House of Commons and the Senate, and we could have made decisions concerning the economy, inflation and unemployment. Instead, the Leader of the Government would rather not give a reason which could have been fundamental, that is, the urgency of the program on its agenda.

People remember the Senate held a very important debate on the second reading stage and I believe the credibility of the Senate is now quite high in the mind of the Canadian public. Why has the Senate now become suddenly the instrument of the government when its credibility is high in the public mind? It is because of its independence with regard to the House of Commons and the executive power.

Why also did we not decide to pass a resolution which could be different from the one before the House of Commons? That has already been done in the past. Why is it the Senate has to adopt the same resolution which will have been discussed and then passed by the House of Commons?

Honourable senators, such behavior will belittle somewhat the role of the Senate as a sober second thought institution and that could also result in a certain confusion if the rules of both Houses do not coincide.

As Senator Flynn said, according to past practice for the introduction of a joint address, the resolution was referred to the Senate only after it had been passed by the House of Commons and I believe I will recite a few dates which Senator Flynn probably had in his notes and which he failed to mention.

I would like now to put on the record a few precedents in our parliamentary practice which confirm the point made by the Leader of the Opposition. In 1940, the amending resolution on the inclusion of unemployment insurance under clause 91 was introduced in the House of Commons on June 25, was passed on June 25 and was referred to the Senate on June 27, and the resolution was passed on June 27, that very same day by the Senate, since there were two identical addresses instead of a single joint address. I asked the question earlier: Why could we not have two addresses, one from the Senate and one from the House of Commons?

In 1946, another precedent, a resolution asking for an adjustment in the representation in the House of Commons, pursuant to changes in population shown by the 1941 census, was introduced in the House of Commons on May 28, was adopted on June 20, and then referred to the Senate on July 2 and passed on July 5.

The government leader said there were no precedents!

In 1949, as Senator Flynn said earlier—there was the resolution concerning Newfoundland joining Confederation which was introduced in the House of Commons on February 14, passed on February 16 and referred to the Senate on February 17 and passed the same day. It was always after the resolution had been passed by the House of Commons.

Senator Riel: And not concurrently.

Senator Asselin: That's a most appropriate word, Senator Riel.

In 1949, another resolution on the right of Canada to amend the British North America Act was introduced in the House of Commons on October 17, it was passed on the 27th and referred to the Senate on November 1, where it was passed on November 9.

Then Senator Flynn spoke about the 1951 resolution on old age pensions. He also quoted cases of amendments dating from 1960, 1964 and 1965. Therefore, it seems to be the established practice, honourable senators, when considering a joint address of both houses, that this resolution be introduced to the Senate only after it has been passed by the House of Commons.

Secondly, I was almost outraged by the remarks of the government leader when he defined the role of the Senate as a house of sober second thought. He misquoted the words used by the Fathers of Confederation, especially Sir John A. Macdonald, when he defined the Senate as he just did.

When it comes to the role of the Senate, when it comes to constitutional amendments requiring a power of delay and of amendment in relation to the House of Commons, they are upheld so that some control may be exercised on the resolution that will eventually be passed by the Commons. Sir John A. Macdonald said that the main purpose of the Senate was to control unreasonable legislation that could be passed by the House of Commons and that the Senate could improve it by giving it sober second thought.

Even if the amendment on the safeguarded sections of the British North America Act requires in practice resolutions from both houses, there are two cases in particular in the recent past when the Senate made some changes to constitutional amendments. In 1936, the Senate refused to agree to an amendment which would have established loan boards to consolidate the borrowing power of provinces and which would at the same time have clarified taxation powers.

In 1960, the Senate amended a proposed amendment to the British North America Act concerning the retirement age of judges, as Senator Flynn has mentioned. The Commons had passed a resolution making retirement mandatory for superior and county court judges. The relevance of this amendment for county court judges was questioned, even though the government wanted to maintain the original amendment. However, the Senate passed an amendment to eliminate the reference to county court judges.

Third, a motion to adjourn a debate in the Senate can be moved at any time, as I said earlier, not by twisting the definition of the Senate as Senator Perrault did earlier, but by invoking the principle of this institution, which is to be a chamber of sober second thought. Sir John A. Macdonald did not say, as Senator Perrault has suggested, that it was to be a chamber of simultaneous thought, but rather of second thought.

The policy of the Senate is to stand up to popular pressures and partisan interests which can be the cause of undue influence on the Commons. It is said that the Senate should have a sobering influence on the House of Commons. In fact, it is the Senate which protects the rights of the minorities in the regions and guards the interests of the provinces. In this historical and important debate on the Constitution which is about to take place the Senate will certainly have the opportunity to carry out those responsibilities. In fact, it is not for the Senate to oppose the will of the people but rather to work in the best interests of confederation and not to fall prey to partisanship as might happen to the elected representatives.

The responsibility of the Senate is not to initiate legislation but to control and regulate it. Then, adjournment of the Senate can be moved on a resolution for a Joint Address on the following grounds: as Senator Flynn said earlier and I also quoted precedents to that effect, in the past, resolutions were introduced in the Senate once they were passed in the House of Commons. In this way the Senate could act as a chamber of sober second thought but it can only do so if it keeps its power to delay and amend the resolution as passed in the House of Commons.

Honourable senators, I believe that the request submitted by the opposition is not unreasonable. The Senate must play its role of upper house by pondering upon legislation and particularly upon the amendments that the House of Commons will hopefully bring to that resolution.

It is unfortunate that the Leader of the Government and his majority group provoked such a negative reaction since the debate started on this important resolution that will be introduced in the Senate. Nothing in the proposals put forward by the Honourable Senator Perrault can justify that the motion presented by the official opposition through its leader be denied.

Obviously, if the majority wants a long debate, it only has to keep on acting as it did tonight, reject reasonable requests, turn a deaf ear to anything the official opposition may say and show no cooperation whatsoever.

If the government majority wants to enter the debate in this spirit, I will tell you that we, in the official opposition, are prepared to fight a full-scale, lengthy, tough and hard battle against the government.

If those opposite do not respond with more flexibility to reasonable requests like those we made tonight, well, in my opinion, we will assume that it will not be possible to cooperate with the majority in passing the resolution which will come before us.

Honourable senators, I believe that this debate will show if the Senate deserves to exist as an institution. All those who are opposed to the resolution or the resolution introduced in the other place and which will be introduced here eventually, all Canadians, all pressure groups and provinces who are opposed to this resolution consider the Senate as the existing group in a position to say no to the executive power and to put forward the views of minority groups and the provinces.

I say that the people will follow more closely the debate in the Senate because they already know that in the House of Commons, the majority rule will prevail. Whether closure is imposed or not, at any rate the majority will prevail and the resolution will be passed in the House of Commons.

But the people have not lost hope. These pressure groups which came to testify before the Committee on the Constitution to express differing views consider the Senate as a group of staunchly objective and independent-minded people who are able to pass sound judgment on comments, views or suggestions made before the committee.

I hope that we shall not start tonight to disappoint them. For I believe that the Senate, while debating the resolution before us simultaneously with the House of Commons, may induce us to make serious mistakes, and then we might bring forward contradictory amendments. It will be difficult later on to have a worthwhile meeting between the House of Commons and the Senate in order to correct any eventual mistakes.

On the other hand, if we wait for the House of Commons to complete its debate, to study its amendments on their merits, we could later review these amendments in an independent way and review the resolution sent by the House of Commons. We could make the required corrections and act as we have always done, assuming our responsibilities when we have to amend legislation coming from the other place which we find deficient.

Therefore, even if the majority has already decided to vote against our motion, I appeal to the goodwill and spirit of cooperation and flexibility of the majority, and they will need it during this debate if they want to receive from the opposition the cooperation which they deserve in such an important debate.

But I suggest right now, and in this I express the views of my colleagues, that if the majority and the government leader show such a small measure of goodwill as they have been doing tonight, if the implication is that the motion put forward by the Leader of the Opposition must be rejected without even asking for amendments, for improvements that would lead to a consensus, and such has not been the attitude of the government leader—his reaction was quite simply to ask his group to defeat the motion put forward by the Leader of the Official Opposition—I would caution the government opposite on such an attitude. Certainly if we were offered some consensus, possibly to improve on the opposition leader's motion, we might have agreed on some working principles. This would have benefited the government as well as all honourable senators, we could have gone on with the discussion of the resolution with a will to improve on the resolution coming from the House of Commons.

Once more, honourable senators, I will support my leader's motion, and I would ask the government to think twice before flatly turning down everything that comes from the opposition.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, the proposal that has been made by the Leader of the Opposition is reasonable and appropriate, and is certainly in keeping with the traditional role of this house; but, from the remarks of the government leader, I think it is quite clear to all of us that the government had decided to reject this procedure even before the arguments had been advanced. Being a realist, I have no intention of taking up the time of the house in arguing for something which the government obviously has decided to reject, but I do want to raise a couple of points that I hope will be favourably considered by the government members in the Senate or the majority in the Senate.

We all recognize the seriousness of the issue with which we are dealing in the resolution that will be debated both here and in the other place. In the first place we should recognize that in this house, among the government members themselves, there is a more complete representation of this country than prevails in the other place, for here there are government members for every province of Canada fairly equally divided because of the basis of Senate representation, which was intended to offset the dominance of certain regions of Canada which prevails in the other place by reason of representation by population. It seems to me that that in itself imposes on this house an added responsibility. It certainly imposes that responsibility on the government members in this house, because they are well aware that in many regions of this country what is proposed is rejected almost outright by the rank and file of Canadian citizens, yet many of those areas are not represented by government members in the other place, where over 85 per cent of the total representation comes from only two provinces. Over and above the concept of sober second thought, therefore, there is the other consideration that I suggest is of particular importance in an issue of this magnitude.

I should like to suggest to the Leader of the Government—and I hope he will give my suggestion serious and favourable consideration—that there is an alternative to what he is proposing and what is proposed in the motion now before us, which is to defer all debate in this house until after the other place has concluded its debate. The reasonable and logical alternative, it seems to me, would be to give to the other place a lead time in this debate of at least two or three weeks before this house begins its deliberations. I say that for two reasons. In the first place, it is important, surely, that the honourable senators in this house know the basic positions that will be taken by the government on the amendments that will be proposed and even on the report of the committee as it is now submitted.

I think that as realists we would all acknowledge that after two or three weeks' debate the government position, at least on the most fundamental issues, will have become quite clear, and that from then on there will be the usual repetition, which is unavoidable in a debate of this kind; but at least the members of this house would, before debating this question, know pretty clearly the position of the government, the position of the majority members in the other place and what their position will be on possible further changes, or the attitude of the report in general.

Bearing in mind that there are more than two and a half times as many members in the other place as there are in this house, it is obvious that the debate there will take some considerable time on an issue of this importance. As the honourable leader said—and I quite agree with him on this point—this is probably one of the most important matters ever to have come before Parliament, and it is almost inconceivable that the government would resort to closure to cut off debate in the other place on an issue of such public importance. If that is a reasonable assumption, then the debate will go on for a couple of months at least. If the other place had a lead time of, say, three weeks to establish their position and make available the information to the members of this house then, because of the smaller number of members in this house, there would still be adequate time for concurrent debate from then on, and it would still enable this house to complete its deliberations at approximately the same time as the other place completes its deliberations.

I earnestly appeal to the Leader of the Government to give the matter favourable consideration. I agree with him that the two resolutions we will be debating are not the same as ordinary legislation in that we have before us a report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, on which this house has been well represented and well served. For that reason, there are arguments for concurrent debate.

However, I submit that we can preserve the traditional role of this chamber. We would have the advantage of knowing the government's position on at least the fundamental issues involved prior to our debate, if we give them a lead time of perhaps three weeks. I raise the matter now because once this motion is disposed of there will probably be no other appropriate opportunity to raise the matter, because concurrent debate will be insisted on from the beginning. I leave the matter with the Leader of the Government and honourable senators. It will be considered as a reasonable alternative and supported by all members.

On motion of Senator Smith, debate adjourned.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ACT, 1977

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold moved the third reading of Bill C-24, to amend laws relating to fiscal transfers to the provinces.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, February 18, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

EXCISE TAX

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and consider the subject matter of Bill C-57, intituled: "An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas," or any matter relating thereto, in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

DISCUSSION ON ALLEGED IRRITANTS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a simple question for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

United States Special Trade Commissioner Bill Brock seemed to pour cold water yesterday on this government's oft-expressed desire for a renegotiated auto pact by saying, "We have a number of difficulties with respect to Canada. We want to talk about the Foreign Investment Review Agency and the energy policies." He added that all these issues, including the auto pact, should be discussed as one package.

I wish to know if it is now this government's view that renegotiation of the auto pact will necessarily be tied to discussions on a broader package of items which the Americans consider irritants?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I have expressed in this chamber, honourable senators, and it has certainly been expressed in the other house a number of times, that there are a number of matters that we would like to discuss, some at our initiative and others in response to questions by the United States since the new administration took office. There is nothing unusual about that. We want to proceed with the orderly, ongoing trading relations, and the future development of trading relations, with the United States, and, indeed, many other areas. Therefore, as soon as officials of the United States have been in office long enough to become familiar with the background that is so essential, there will be a number of meetings between Canadian ministers and United States secretaries. Whether or not a date will now be designated for any one of these specific matters, or even a group of the matters, the honourable senator has mentioned, I do not know. I can make some inquiries, but I do not believe there has yet been a determination of a mutually convenient time to exchange views on a number of these things.

DISCUSSION OF CANADIAN ENERGY POLICY

Hon. Martial Asselin: In order to give the Senate further information, would the Minister of State for Economic Development make inquiries and inform the Senate of the particular difficulties that exist with the new United States administration with respect to Canada's energy policies?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Well, honourable senators, it is a bit unfair at this stage to suggest that we are having difficulties with the United States administration. There have been expressions of opinion by a number of people in the United States, including business leaders and others, but I do not believe that to this point in time we have had an official communiqué or even an expression of opinion by the new senior officers of the American administration commenting one way or the other on Canada's national energy policies.

RENEGOTIATION OF AUTO PACT

Hon. Martial Asselin: Does the Minister of State for Economic Development know when the auto pact will be renegotiated with the United States? Will it be this year or next year?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I have already indicated that I will make inquiries. If a date for an exchange of views has been set, I will bring that information back to this chamber. I do not believe that that has happened. Following that, what the honourable senator has suggested with regard to renegotiation would come into play. It has not been determined whether or not this will occur and, obviously, after the first determination is made, timing would be a consideration.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

VISIT TO CANADA—PROPOSED AGENDA

Hon. Martial Asselin: We heard this morning that the President of the United States will come to Canada on March 10. Does the government intend to provide the agenda of the discussions between the Prime Minister and cabinet ministers and the President of the United States to the Senate in advance?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I am sure that the honourable senator has been around here long enough to know the precedents with respect to indicating an agenda or a partial agenda of the matters that will be under discussion. I expect that the usual practice will be followed.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO CHRYSLER CORPORATION

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. It concerns the recent announcement with regard to Chrysler. I understand that on top of the $150 million Chrysler loan guarantee which will become effective in 1983, the company, provided it invests in certain new projects, will be able to draw on an extra $50 million which brings the amount up to the original $200 million. Would the minister indicate whether or not the expenditures on these new projects will be included in the $681 million to be invested according to the agreement, or would it be in addition to that amount?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I have to take that question as notice. I will try to unravel just exactly what the honourable senator is asking, because I do not understand at the moment.

Senator Doody: Quite frankly, I do not understand either, or I would not be asking.

Senator Olson: I understand the deal, but I do not understand the senator's question.

Senator Doody: There are a couple of things I would ask, if I may. Is that $50 million in guaranteed investment, which I mentioned earlier, on top of the $681 million? In other words, can Chrysler get the original $200 million total guarantee without investing the $1 billion originally agreed upon?

Senator Olson: Obviously, honourable senators, the senator has answered his own question.

Senator Doody: Could you explain it to me?

Senator Olson: He knows very well that the loan guarantees could not come into play until, as he said, 1983. I believe that some of the guarantees do not come into play until somewhat later than that. Certainly, there is an agreement by the company to deliver on some of their undertakings in advance of these loan guarantees becoming operative. In addition, the honourable senator will also respect the fact that by the time these guarantees come into play, the situation will be substantially clarified and Chrysler will have sorted out some of the problems on a much larger scale. At that time the viability of the company on that scale will be much better known than it is today.

Senator Doody: I thank the minister for his answer, although I am not quite sure what I am thanking him for.

Senator Olson: I am not quite sure what you asked.

Senator Doody: That is right. There appears to be a great deal of mystery about this particular deal and that is perhaps the question. I would feel more comfortable if we could get some straight answers. Perhaps I will try to get at the deal from the other side and ask about some of the commitments which Chrysler was to have made. I understand now that Chrysler will guarantee approximately 3,000 fewer jobs than it guaranteed under the original agreement, even though the $200 million total guarantee may still be in place. The minister has indicated that some of these agreements may take a little longer to come into effect. For how long after 1983 has the company undertaken to guarantee the jobs? In other words, did Chrysler undertake to provide X number of jobs in 1983 to fulfil its obligation, and can it then in, say, 1985 or 1986, close down its plants and put us back to where we were in 1980, or is there some down-the-road guarantee on employment?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think it would be useful if I brought in a brief statement tomorrow which, I believe, would be essentially the same, in many respects, as the press release by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce a few days ago but, perhaps, containing some clarification, rather than try to answer the hypotheses raised by the honourable senator, since he has already admitted he did not actually understand my answer—and he did not truly understand what he was asking either. It seems to me it would be better if we had a firm basis on which I could give some clarification and then, perhaps, he could ask some intelligent questions based on that.

Senator Doody: I thank the honourable minister; he is most co-operative.

Hon. R. James Balfour: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for Economic Development on the same subject, the Chrysler loan arrangement. Perhaps he would prefer to include a response to my question in his statement tomorrow. It concerns the matter of the Canadian government's agreeing not to press Chrysler to pay some $200 million in duties owed for failing to meet safeguard provisions under the auto pact which, of course, in effect, amounts to an additional $200 million interest-free loan from the taxpayers of Canada.

Would the minister either confirm or deny that that is the arrangement with Chrysler? Was it part of the original agreement that Canada would not press for payment of this outstanding debt and, if so, what are the terms of that forbearance? For what length of time will the Government of Canada decline to press Chrysler for this money owed to the taxpayers of Canada?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, in my reply tomorrow I will include the content of that question because I should like to be very accurate, as usual, in the reply I make.

Senator Flynn: More than usual.

Senator Olson: Again, since some hypothetical questions are raised concerning the length of time, the terms and conditions, forbearance, and certain other matters, I will include that in my reply tomorrow.

ENERGY

OIL—IMPORTATION FROM MEXICO

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Minister of State for Economic Development a question about the famous Mexican oil deal which, so far, seems to be a rather inglorious episode in the ongoing saga of Liberal oil policy.

The minister will recall that the original understanding with the Mexicans was that we would import 100,000 barrels a day. The agreement reached with the Mexicans during the visit of the President of Mexico was 50,000 barrels a day.

Would the Minister of State for Economic Development tell us whether we have yet reached the 50,000-barrel-per-day level which was supposed to have been reached by the end of 1980? If not, can he tell us why, and when does he expect we will reach that level?

Furthermore, it appears that of the 20,000 to 25,000 barrels a day that we may be importing now, quite a higher proportion than expected is heavy crude rather than lighter oils. Would the minister tell us what is being done about this problem?

Finally, can the minister say how much more we are paying the Mexicans for this oil than we are paying our fellow Canadians in the western provinces for their oil?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am always rather amused by questions where, apparently, the honourable senator is trying to elicit information but, in the preamble to the question, he answers the question before he asks it. As an example, he asked how much of the 50,000 barrels a day we were importing, and then he states that apparently we are only up to 25,000 barrels a day.

Senator Murray: I want to know officially.

Senator Olson: I will endeavour to furnish you with an official statement tomorrow concerning the actual amounts that have come in, if I can obtain it that soon.

It seems to me that if my honourable friend is going to believe part of the press reports that come out, he should also believe the reasons given for the information contained in those press reports. According to the press statements, the reason for the level of 25,000 barrels a day is because of some severe weather which prevented the Mexicans from moving the oil up to the levels of the commitment.

Senator Murray: That is some storm; it has been going on for months.

Senator Olson: I do not believe anyone can guarantee physical deliveries under such severe and adverse conditions, when it is physically impossible to do so. If my honourable friend thinks that is some fault of this government, then he is even more unreasonable than I thought he was—and that was at a pretty high level. That information will probably be contained in the answer I will give tomorrow.

• (1420)

As far as the other part of his question is concerned, it was a rhetorical question. I say that because he already knows the answer to the question respecting the price of that oil, and he already knows the answer to the question regarding certain prices for certain types of oil in Canada. He knows, for example, that oil coming out of the tar sands plants has a suggested price of $38 plus inflation. Is that the figure he wants me to use, or would he like to have some of the others? I do not mind doing his homework for him, but I have already provided answers to all the questions he asked today.

Senator Langlois: Touché.

Senator Murray: Do I understand that the minister is going to bring a statement to the Senate on the question of when he expects us to reach the 50,000-barrels-a-day level; secondly, on what the proportion of the heavier crude to the lighter oils is and what the government expects to do about that; and thirdly, on the price we will be paying? Will the minister bring a statement to the Senate on those matters on the next sitting day?

Senator Olson: I am not sure that I can get all that information together for tomorrow, but I will do so as soon as possible.

Senator Flynn: I am not sure you can.

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF PETROFINA CANADA INC.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. The question deals with an answer that the honourable senator tabled yesterday referring to the purchase of Petrofina by Petro-Canada. Part of that answer reads as follows:

> Petro-Canada, based on its assessment of the worth of Petrofina, has concluded that $120 per share is an appropriate amount. While the details of this assessment must remain confidential—

Would the minister tell us why they must remain confidential? Is there something that the people of Canada should not know? It is their money that is going to be used to pay this outrageous price.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I can answer that question in a few words; it must remain confidential until the deal is completely consummated.

PURCHASES OF OIL COMPANIES—GOVERNMENT INVOLVEMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): While I am on my feet, I think it would be helpful if I now answered a question raised by Senator Charbonneau in January. I was going to wait until delayed answers were called for, but I think it would be more appropriate to answer that now.

Senator Charbonneau asked whether the government was involved in any alleged negotiations to purchase oil companies.

The answer is that the federal government is involved to the extent that Petro-Canada is an agency of the Crown and, therefore, would be acting within the guidelines of government policy.

Since the question was posed in January, there has, of course, been an announcement of Petro-Canada's acquisition of Petrofina. In retrospect, Senator Charbonneau's question appears to have have been prophetic. I would, of course, not wish to comment on his speculations with respect to other acquisitions.

By way of answering the questions, I think the honourable senator should appreciate that corporate acquisitions, and any information pertaining to such activities, are extremely delicate matters for a variety of fairly obvious reasons. Accordingly, I will not, nor should I be asked, to comment on rumoured takeovers. I would note, however, that since the National Energy Program is in part designed to restructure and Canadianize the oil and gas industry, one would expect activities and rumours of the sort which we have witnessed over the past several months to continue.

Hon. C. William Doody: I have a supplementary question for the minister. Would the minister undertake to make available to the Senate the details of the assessment once the deal is finally consummated? I understand that an outside consultant was hired to help the company arrive at this assessment. Could those documents be made available?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, yes, that becomes part of public information after it is completed.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government a question which relates to one that I asked in the house on January 20. It was in reference to the Garrison Dam project and it involves Canada-United States relations. At that time my leader said:

> —they have invited Canadian scientific and technical experts to visit their Water and Power Resources Service Engineering and Research Centre in Colorado—

That is a long way from my area.

> —to review possible project design modifications. This visit is tentatively scheduled for tomorrow and the following two days—that is, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday.

The leader was making reference to January 21, 22 and 23.

[Senator Olson.]

There is mounting concern in Manitoba about the Garrison Dam project, and the insistence of the new Governor of North Dakota, Governor Olson, that the project be continued. This refers to the 100,000 hectares of land that they would drain. All of that water would come into Manitoba and destroy the fish in our lakes—a point to which I made reference before. Governor Olson is introducing new legislation in North Dakota to provide funds to finish the project. According to an article in the Winnipeg Free Press of Saturday, February 14, 1981, he said he will be asking for full funding, and will be presenting the request to the President of the United States this coming week.

In view of the insistence of the governor that the project be carried on, I think we cannot now sit back and say we will just wait and see what will be the outcome of the meeting which took place a couple of weeks ago. I hope the leader will be able to obtain the results of that meeting for us, but I also believe that possibly some representations should now be made at the federal level for the protection of Manitobans.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to thank Senator Guay for his eloquent expression of concern about Canadian interest in this very important matter. I will take the question as urgent notice, and attempt to obtain information which can be provided to Senator Guay and other honourable senators as soon as possible.

THE CONSTITUTION

REFERENCES TO APPEAL COURTS BY PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked on January 13 by Senator Roblin regarding the reference of the government's constitutional proposals to appeal courts.

As I stated earlier to the honourable senator, the government intends to continue with its announced schedule. I might add, however, that the government is encouraged by the recent decision of the Manitoba Court of Appeal in this matter, and is naturally interested in the outcome of various other court cases.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You mean the government is not discouraged.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the government is made up of inveterate optimists.

PARLIAMENT

INTERNSHIP PROGRAM

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked on February 12 by Senator Marshall concerning the parliamentary internship program.

While the government believes the parliamentary internship program to be very worthwhile, it is not up to the government to keep it going since it is not the government's program, as honourable senators are probably aware.

The parliamentary internship program was originated and is still operated by the Canadian Political Science Association. It is, therefore, their responsibility. The program went through all-party committees in the other place and had the approval of the house leaders of all parties as well as the Speaker.

Professor Robert Jackson of Carleton University is presently the director of the program, and my office has been informed that some new sponsors have been found to help fund the program over the next three years. Notably, the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association has pledged $60,000 a year for this period. Inco has pledged $8,000 a year, and Nova has pledged $6,000 a year for the same period. As well, there are about two dozen other contributors to the program. That should serve to alleviate the honourable senator's concern over the continuation of the program.

In response to the honourable senator's supplementary question, there is no problem in principle with the inclusion of the Senate in the program. However, it must be recognized that the program was originated by the Canadian Political Science Association and the House of Commons, as I stated earlier. I am informed that several M.P's have been very helpful in raising the needed funds for the program, and individual senators are encouraged to do the same, since it costs about $12,000 per intern per year.

In order to change the program to include the Senate, several committees within the Canadian Political Science Association would have to be consulted before the change could be approved, but apparently the main problem would be financing.

Honourable senators will be pleased to know that parliamentary interns are given the opportunity to acquire a better understanding of the Senate. During the course of their orientation they establish an informal relationship with members of this chamber, and many senators have opportunities to speak with interns individually and as groups.

The suggestion has been advanced that if the Senate should find it desirable to have two or more parliamentary interns directly attached to the Senate, it would be necessary to have the structural changes in the program approved by the various committees within Parliament and the Canadian Political Science Association, as well as determining the base of the funding for the program.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, as a long-time member of the House of Commons and the CPSA, I still say that the program originated not with the political scientists but with the parliamentarians. May I ask the government leader to tell us, either today or at some later time, what efforts the Senate has made to make it clear that for any intern to have knowledge of the parliamentary process, an awareness of what is going on in the Senate is imperative? Could he also tell us what facilities have been offered by the Senate to these very important young people who are a part of the intern program, which, I repeat, was instigated by parliamentarians?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice. I am sure that the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, with his distinguished career in public life and education, is in an excellent position to make representations to the Canadian Political Science Association. I understand that he is a long-time member. May I suggest that he make efforts in this way?

It seems to me that if there are a number of senators interested in the extension of the internship program to the Senate—and I find merit in the idea, together with Senator Macquarrie, Senator Marshall and others—perhaps representatives from both parties serving in the Senate, and perhaps those who sit as independents, may wish to convene a meeting to discuss which way we should proceed. I am sure it would have the support of the distinguished Leader of the Opposition, and I will certainly do everything I can to help.

Senator Macquarrie: A very good answer, sir.

Senator Flynn: Now that the Senate is not threatened any more by the constitutional resolution.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO CHRYSLER CORPORATION—AMENDED AND RESTATED LOAN INSURANCE AGREEMENT TABLED

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I seek permission to table a document which is a news release respecting the new agreement between Chrysler Canada and the Government of Canada. It includes a copy of the amended and restated agreement to provide loan insurance between Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada, acting through the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and Chrysler Canada Ltd. and Chrysler Corporation; and the Chrysler Canada Ltd. 1980-85 Operating and Financing Plan.

I believe that those documents will satisfy the questions that were raised by honourable senators a few moments ago. However, if after tomorrow honourable senators wish to raise further questions, I will obtain some more specific details about the agreement.

Therefore, honourable senators, I table:

> Amended and restated agreement to provide loan insurance between the Government of Canada and Chrysler Canada Ltd. and Chrysler Corporation, dated as of February 17, 1981.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I read that document this morning, and that is what prompted the questions.

Senator Olson: If honourable senators already have copies, then there is no point in tabling it.

ENERGY

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF PETROFINA CANADA INC.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the Minister of State for Economic Development supplementary to that asked earlier by Senator Doody? In light of the questions and critical comments with respect to the so-called Petrofina deal, is the minister aware that yesterday Petrofina reported its profits picture for the year at something just short of $100 million, which breaks down, on a share basis at, I believe, $8.66, as compared to the previous year of $6.13, and that the deal is looking better all the time?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes, honourable senators. I am aware of this improvement. Not only that. I want to agree with Senator McElman that the situation is not only looking better for this year, but that the prospects for the future are even better than that.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Would the honourable the minister say, as he has said to others, that the honourable senator has given the answer in putting the question?

Senator Olson: The Honourable Senator McElman laid a certain amount of groundwork for the question that he wanted to raise, but certainly that is in keeping with what seems to be the accepted practice here. I do not think that one should discourage the introduction of good news in this chamber once in a while.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, could I just say to the Leader of the Opposition that at least my questions are short and are not speeches?

Senator Flynn: You are a good example for many.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, by way of supplementary, may I ask the Minister of State for Economic Development whether the government has yet reached a determination as to when the Canadian ownership account, or tax, will be imposed upon Canadians to pay for this take-over, and over what period of time the money will be raised from that tax? Will he also assure the Senate that the amount of the tax imposed will not be such as to take the price of petroleum products over the maximum amounts that were committed by the Prime Minister of Canada during the election campaign?

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, I can say that the government has not decided when the levy will be introduced to cover the amount of equity that will be needed, nor, indeed, has the stage been reached at which the exact amount of equity, as opposed to debt, is known that will be needed to cover the approximately $1.46 billion that is involved; but I can tell my honourable friend that I have seen certain rough calculations, the effect of which is that if the entire amount were to be collected over a two-year period it would mean an increase of slightly less than one cent per litre.

Senator Murray: But if that were the case, in the meantime PetroCan would have to arrange for transitional or bridge financing of some kind, presumably from the banks. As the minister will be aware, there would be very considerable interest payments required to service that debt. Would that money be coming from the Canadian ownership account as well, and would the minister agree that if the entire amount were to be collected by way of imposition of the $4 per barrel tax, it would be done in approximately six months?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I gave a hypothetical calculation of what would be raised over a two-year period reduced to the cost per litre. I did not give any indication of the total amount, what the bridge financing was going to cost, or any of that; but, obviously, when the deal is complete and the decisions are made as to when and how rapidly the amount would be collected for that acquisition, all that information will be made known to my honourable friend. I think we can state also that the totality of the cost to the consumer, including this, will be less than the totality of what was forecast in the budget of December 11, 1979. That is very important.

Senator Murray: I am very glad to have that undertaking, because a little later, down the road, we are going to look at a comparison of those two figures, and we shall see whether or not that turns out to be the case.

May I simply ask the minister how soon we may expect the government to get around to a decision on this rather important matter of how this take-over is going to be financed?

Senator Olson: As soon as possible. Don't be anxious.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR DELAY OF DEBATE ON RESOLUTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN NEGATIVED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Flynn that the Senate do not consider approval of the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, or the resolution based on that report, before the House of Commons has disposed of them.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should thank my friends opposite for the very warm welcome with which they greeted me when I rose. I trust they will be in as good humour when I finish. I expect to be gentle and persuasive, as usual; therefore, I look forward to their continuing warmth and support.

I rise to support the motion which my leader so ably moved and discussed yesterday. To me, it simply makes good sense and is in line with the long-standing custom and practice of the Senate.

At this point I should like to turn for a moment to the speech Senator Manning made last night. In his usual very sensible way, he suggested a compromise. As I understood him, the compromise he put forward is that this chamber should give the debate in the other place a lead time of two or three weeks before we begin here. Perhaps I will have a little more to say about that point before I finish. Senator Manning made the suggestion, as I understood him, because it seemed to him that the government had already made a decision in favour of concurrent debate and they might not be easily persuaded to change it. Senator Manning has had more experience than I have had with the Leader of the Government and his colleagues, and it may therefore be that he is justified in his somewhat pessimistic view of the degree to which they are receptive to sound argument and good reason. However, as I have heard the Leader of the Government say about himself so often, I am an optimist. I would therefore like to give the Leader of the Government and his colleagues an opportunity to yield to good sense and accept my leader's motion. With your forbearance, honourable senators, I will now offer that opportunity.

As to the precedents relative to this particular matter, Senator Flynn and Senator Asselin put them on the record very clearly yesterday, and there is no need for me to repeat them. Those precedents, I submit, show without exception that constitutional addresses have been debated in the other place first and in the Senate only after debate in the other place has finished. This is and has been the practice so far as I can recall, which is only a few years, of course; and I find, by looking at the authorities, that it has been the practice with all matters except those first introduced in the Senate. In the latter case, of course, the other place does not take such matters into consideration unless and until the Senate has completed its debate and has sent a message saying so and praying for concurrence.

I submit, honourable senators, that the practice as between the two houses has always been sequential debate and not concurrent debate. The reason for this practice, this custom, this usage is, I believe, simple and sensible, for until one house has finished its consideration the other house does not know what it is being asked to deal with, or, indeed, whether there is anything to deal with at all. The house in which the motion is first discussed may pass it without amendment or with some amendment, great or small, or may not pass it at all. If the motion is not passed at all, there is nothing for the other house to debate, and any time spent in concurrent debate is simply wasted. If the motion is passed with amendment, the amendment may be such as to do away with or improve the subject of debate in the other house, and again time spent in debating that matter will have been wasted.

Assuming, as in this constitutional matter, that the motion or legislation is the proposal by the government, the second house—which, in this case, is the Senate—will not know what the government is prepared to accept until the first house—in this case, the Commons—has finished with the matter. I note that the Leader of the Government did not dispute the precedents named by my leader and by Senator Asselin; he did not cite any precedents to the contrary, so far as I can note. I think, then, that we are all entitled, indeed, bound to accept that the precedents mentioned by my leader and Senator Asselin show clearly what this chamber has considered the proper custom and usage to be followed.

The weight which should be given to such customs and usages is clearly set out in the first rule of the Rules of the Senate of Canada, which I am sure every senator is familiar with. Rule 1 reads:

> In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

This rule, I submit, shows that without question the customs and usages of the Senate are to be followed, when there is no particular rule applicable, so far as is practicable. They are not lightly to be cast aside at the wish of a senator or a government. I point out, as I am sure everyone would agree, that customs and usages are those found in the available precedents showing what the action of the house has been in similar circumstances in the past. Here the precedents have been clearly put before the chamber, as I have said, and have not been disputed. I therefore submit that the motion of Senator Flynn is consistent with and is supported by rule 1. No reason has been given to indicate that the motion is not practicable. Therefore, it should be accepted, I submit, as required by rule 1.

There is also in our rule book Appendix II which is entitled, "Forms and Proceedings." It begins at page 40 of the rule book with an index. Its substantive contents begin at page 41, and the very first sentence reads:

I am not sure who composed this material, but I have checked back and it is in previous rule books, perhaps not in exactly the same way but certainly containing the same substance. I think we are entitled to assume that it would not have been included in our rule book by the Rules Committee unless it had been considered authoritative. I therefore think it is reasonable to refer to it and to consider it as authoritative.

● (1450)

At page 51 of the Rules of the Senate, under the heading "Messages between Houses," the matter of relations between the two houses in respect of legislation is considered. An examination of this material shows that the matter of concurrent debate is not considered at all and that it is clear that the material is written on the assumption that a matter is introduced in and considered by one house, which, when it has finished its consideration, sends a message to the other house telling that other house what it has done and asking that other house to concur in it. There is no provision for concurrent consideration, but there is set out what happens when one house does not concur in what the other has already done. That will be found at page 53.

So, again I say that the customs and usages of the Senate are based on consideration by one house, followed by a message from that house to the other informing the other of what it has done and asking concurrence therein. It is only on receipt of that message that debate in the other house begins. That is what the present motion asks.

Again, I say that the Leader of the Government in the Senate does not dispute the precedents and what they show have been the customs and usages of the Senate. Being unable to dispute them, however, he endeavours to distract attention from the weight that should be given to them by saying that in the case of one such precedent—that of 1960, particularly on the dates June 14, July 13 and July 29—concurrent debates might—and I emphasize that, as I followed him, "might" was all that he could say—concurrent debates might have been simpler than the sequential debates, although I believe he fell far short of establishing even that "might have been" was a fair proposition.

I wish to say, first, however, that there are more precedents than those of 1960, and they are all to be found in the remarks of the two senators I have mentioned. In any event, when the line of precedents establishes certain customs and usages, that line is no less persuasive because in one of them it "might" have been easier not to follow the precedents.

The Leader of the Government referred to one of the traditional and established roles of the Senate as being the body of sober second thought. He acknowledged the acceptance and the importance of this role. He then went on to make what, to me, was the extraordinary and illogical argument that, although this role was important in most things, it should not apply in this, the most important matter that has come before us for many years, or perhaps that has ever come before us. In effect, he was saying, it seems to me and I submit to honourable senators, that sober second thought is good in ordinary matters but it has no place in the most important matter.

Then, as I followed him, he argued that sequential debate would be time consuming but that concurrent debate would be time efficient. But how would concurrent debate be time efficient? Certainly, the other place will not debate either more or less because its debate is concurrent with ours. It will proceed at its own pace in any event and regardless of the procedure we adopt. It is true that sequential debate is likely to cause a longer lapse of time between the beginning of debate in the other place and its completion here, but while we would be debating it here, the other place would have finished and would be able to get on with such matters as the economy, unemployment and energy, just as quickly and effectively as if the debate had been concurrent.

I pause to ask myself, and I ask honourable senators: Why all this concern with total lapse of time anyway? The finished product, if there is one, will be no better or no worse, if it comes on one day as opposed to another. A number of explanations occur to me which might make the government feel that time is important, but in the interests of being gentle and persuasive I shall omit them so as not to arouse the ire of the honourable gentleman opposite who, of course, knows what they are anyway, having heard them many times.

Honourable senators, I submit to you that the Leader of the Government has not given the Senate a single good reason why the motion should be defeated. What he has given us are excuses—and perhaps if I were not disposed to be gentle I would describe those excuses—for a decision already made.

Let me ask who or what will be the next victim, if the government gets its way now and pays no attention to customs and usages? Nobody knows, because nobody knows when the next time will be that somebody or something will get in the government's way.

I would, therefore, prefer to ask honourable senators now to support the motion and uphold the customs and usages of the Senate. It may, however, be that the government would prefer Senator Manning's suggested compromise.

Accordingly, in that frame of mind and with that object in view, I move, seconded by Senator Molson:

> That the motion be amended by striking out all of the words after the word "report" in the third line thereof and substituting the following therefor: "until the eleventh of March."

The motion as amended would then read:

> That the Senate do not consider approval of the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, or the resolution based on that report, until the eleventh of March.

If I may say so, as anyone can easily calculate by referral to the date, that is a period of three weeks from today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald:

> That the Senate do not consider approval of the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, or the resolution based on that report, before the House of Commons has disposed of them.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Smith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molson:

> That the motion be amended by striking out all of the words after the word "report" in the third line thereof and substituting the following therefor: "until the eleventh of March."

The motion as amended would then read:

> That the Senate do not consider approval of the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Consitution, or the resolution based on that report, until the eleventh of March.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I fully realize the situation with regard to this resolution. I know the government's commitment. We all understand that. I understand, therefore, that the government party members are anxious to have this resolution passed by this chamber.

I also understand, in this world of politics, why the opposition party does not agree with that particular move. I think both positions are quite understandable, quite justifiable and quite proper.

• (1500)

The suggestion by Senator Manning that there be a period of delay—I believe he called it "a little lead time"—to enable the Commons to get on with the matter, makes good sense from every point of view. While it may not suit the political wishes of either party, I believe it is a very wise suggestion from the point of view of the Senate, the value of debate, and the good of the country in finding its new Constitution.

For that reason, I take great pleasure in seconding the motion in amendment of Senator Smith.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I find myself in a difficult position because of the high respect which I have for those who support both the amendment and the motion. I suppose I would like to support the amendment, for it is a very reasonable compromise between the two positions.

As to the motion itself, if I understand the argument correctly, the opposition is invoking precedent, custom and usage in order to establish the fact that we should deal with this matter in a sequential way. I will not attempt to argue the legality of that situation; I leave that to others.

However, to deal with the essence of the matter, it seems to me that we in this chamber constantly find ourselves reacting to actions taken by others. Senator Smith suggested that we find out, first of all, the government's thoughts on the matter. I believe another argument was, "Let us see where the other place stands on this issue." One of the things which I enjoyed very much in the past was the very strong attempt that was made to have bills introduced in the Senate and then considered by the House of Commons. When I first came to this house, that was the case with a number of bills.

I remember the introduction of the bill which changed our coinage and the bill which created the National Museums Corporation, both of which were introduced in the Senate and subsequently sent to the House of Commons. I believe that the use of this procedure has diminished over the last few years. There are still bills introduced in the Senate, but not as many, and they are not as important. I would like to see a much greater workload placed on the Senate as a consequence of the introduction of government bills here.

We have been given an opportunity to consider this bill without having to decide what the Commons thinks or says. Usage aside, that seems to me to be a very valuable possibility. We should take advantage of it.

While I have great respect for Senator Manning and the compromise suggested by the amendment, I do believe it is more important to grasp the fact that we have an opportunity to consider the bill as the Senate, to decide what we want to see in it, and not react to either what the government wants or what we perceive the government wants or what the House of Commons wants or what we perceive the House of Commons wants. For that reason—not because of usage, custom or precedent, but the valid ground that this is an opportunity for the Senate—I will vote against the amendment, and I will vote against the motion.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I can understand the argument made by Senator Everett, but we are not faced with the same type of situation. The Senate is not considering a bill which originated in this place. This situation is quite different. It is a matter which is vital to the future of Canada. The essence of a Constitution is that there be a consensus. Of course, if by accident, the House of Commons were to say, "No", then it would be stupid on our part to have said "Yes" in advance.

In any event, the problem is now with the amendment. The question is whether we should delay consideration of the resolution until it has been disposed of by the other place, or whether we should delay consideration until March 11, which is the substance of the amendment moved by Senator Smith following Senator Manning's lead.

As far as I am concerned, if the suggestion contained in the amendment is more acceptable to the government leader and the majority in this place, I have no objection to the adoption of the amendment as opposed to my motion. That is the point I want to make at this time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall speak first on the amendment, although some of my observations in that regard will apply equally to the motion. I intervene on both points, by saying, first, that I believe all senators share some of the concerns that lie behind both the motion and the amendment. I know I do. In order to explain why I say that, it is important to consider three basic steps. We are talking about the introduction of the resolution in each house, pursuit of the debate in each house and the disposition of the resolution in each house.

In this instance the first stage is a fact. The introduction is, in effect, taking place in both houses at virtually the same time. Of course, there is plenty of precedent to support the introduction of the resolution in both houses simultaneously. It began in 1940. Before that time there was no precedent for the introduction of a resolution in the two places at the same time, as Senator Smith, Senator Asselin and Senator Flynn have pointed out. Following 1940 it was the vogue, for a period of approximately 20 years, to introduce such matters simultaneously. On none of those cases did the second stage—namely, the debate—take place at the same time; nor did the disposition take place at exactly the same time, although in many cases it was very close—a matter of 24 hours in some cases.

The motion refers to stages 2 and 3. It says that we should not debate the matter until these stages have all been completed in the other place. The concern that we all share—and I may be corrected if I am wrong, but I have paid attention to all of the interventions—is disposal of the matter much sooner than it is disposed of in the other place.

The motion talks about our not debating the matter until after its disposition in the other place. The amendment talks about giving the House of Commons some lead time. In my respectful submission, honourable senators, the difference between the amendment and the motion is not a difference in kind but simply a difference in degree because they both deal with stage two. Both the motion, stating that we should not debate at all until after disposition in the other place, and the amendment, stating that we should delay the debate for a certain period, really deal with the debate portion.

It is at that point that there is some difference, in my opinion, between the views of the opposition, the views of the government party and, perhaps, the views of individual senators.

I share the concerns that I detected in the interventions of Senators Flynn, Asselin and Smith on the question of our disposing of this matter too soon before it is disposed of in the other place. The sequential aspect of having the Senate dispose of the matter after it is disposed of in the other place is a principle that I found persuasive as it was expressed by the three honourable senators I have just mentioned.

On the question of debate, it seems to me, for the reasons advanced by Senators Everett and Perrault, that there is no need for, and no advantage to be gained by, delaying the debate on a matter which has received the extensive pre-study this matter has. We should take our due time with the debate. But I feel that we should start the debate now, and that we should talk later about the sequence of disposition as distinct from the sequence of the debate.

For those reasons, honourable senators, I will vote against both the motion in amendment and the main motion, but I ask honourable senators' leave to add a comment or two later about the motion itself, although many of the observations I have made relate equally to it. I do want to add two or three detailed points supporting the essence of Senator Flynn's intervention when it relates to the motion itself.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Would the honourable senator accept a question before he moves away from the amendment?

Senator Frith: Yes, certainly.

Senator Grosart: Would the Leader of the Government or his deputy be prepared, at this time, to give the Senate an undertaking that the government will not seek to complete the disposition stage in the Senate before a similar stage is completed in the other place?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the only information I can give on that point is to repeat my concern and my own view that the preferable sequence is for the House of Commons to dispose of it before the Senate does. I would add that I am already discussing that matter with the Leader of the Opposition, and I hope we will be able to settle the matter.

I thank Senator Grosart for the question because I do want to say that I hope no honourable senator will take the result of the vote on this motion or the amendment, should they both be defeated, as an indication that we are not interested in talking about setting up a reasonable program for debate, giving ample time and working towards the principle raised by Senator Grosart, namely, a disposition, as distinct from debate, more in conformity with the tradition of the Senate having the last word.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Grosart: It seems to me, honourable senators, that the deputy leader has not completely understood the reason for the opposition on this side to the procedure suggested by the government. He has stressed that we are thinking only of the problem of debating, at the same time as the House of Commons, this same question, without taking into consideration what would seem to me to be an essential matter, and that is, what will happen if, in the other place, an amendment is suggested by the Opposition or another member and the amendment is accepted? Will that be communicated immediately to the Senate? In the course of a debate, will the Senate be informed that, because of something that has happened simultaneously and concurrently in the House of Commons, the government in the Senate, as opposed to the government in the House of Commons, is prepared to change the whole course of debate? The possibility of that happening seems to me to be a very good reason for postponing the debate stage here.

I might indicate some other similar types of problem. Perhaps the government will give an answer to an objection raised in the other place, and, under our rules, as I understand them, we cannot quote the statement made in the other place. This, of course, is another reason for what has been called the "precedent" for not having in this type of situation, concurrent debates.

Senator Everett made another point, but it seemed to me that he was, at more than one stage of his argument, still confused by the fact that we are not dealing with a "bill." On two occasions he referred to the matter before us as a "bill," when, of course, it is not a bill. That is not just a semantic observation because it is an essential part of the difference in the approach we take. Of course, there would be nothing objectionable at all—in fact, much would be desirable—if more bills were introduced and debated here in the first place.

However, I can foresee other examples of confusion which may arise as a result of simultaneous debate. I would, therefore, support the amendment at this time for that reason and because this is one of the rare occasions when an important amendment from the opposition has been supported by the other two parties in the Senate, the "Manning party" and the "Molson party," neither of which can properly be said to be in opposition. In other words, here we have all three parties on this side of the house urging the government to reconsider. I am not so concerned with the precedents because precedents here have come to be like our rules—we do not pay much attention to them unless someone wants to argue them, particularly on the government side, for a particular reason, at which time we are given quotations from long out-of-date sections of Beauchesne.

I would urge the government to reconsider this on the grounds of common sense. Surely if you look at the situation that can develop, it makes the kind of common sense that Senator Manning suggested to delay the debate, because it seems obvious—again, as Senator Manning pointed out—that there are far more members likely to want to speak on this in the House of Commons than there are in this chamber. Why would we, therefore, put ourselves in the ridiculous position of having the government send us messages to slow up or keep it going? We do not want to get into the absurd position of having completed the debate in the Senate and then the Leader of the Government or his deputy saying, "Now, I did indicate that it made a lot of sense for us not to dispose of this before the House of Commons did; therefore, let us sit and wait. For two or three weeks we will do nothing. We will pretend we still have the matter before us and that we are still debating it." We will be going on day after day adjourning the debate in someone's name.

What would be the position if, on this side, there was a feeling on the part of an individual senator, or more than one senator, that going slow might make sense?

When a senator on this side adjourns the debate and says that he is not prepared to go ahead with it for a week or so, will the government say that he cannot hold the adjournment—that precedent or custom will not be honoured? Is that going to be the situation?

I raise these matters because they seem to indicate the common sense of the government's taking into consideration at least, and preferably undertaking to accept, the motion that now has the support of three of the four parties represented in this chamber.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have already intervened on this subject once, so I am not entitled to speak on it again. However, I want to say that some of the points raised by Senator Grosart I should like to deal with in a short intervention on the motion itself. On the question of the government's acceptance of amendments, perhaps the Leader of the Government wishes to say something apropos what was mentioned by the honourable senator.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition, and the suggestion made by Senator Manning yesterday, which was accepted by the Leader of the Opposition, have been considered carefully by the government.

May I say that many honourable senators believe that there is real merit in having, first of all, an opportunity given to senators to participate now—not later—in the constitutional debate. It is one of the most important matters ever to come before the Parliament of Canada. Many senators would find it unthinkable and unacceptable to be asked to wait until March 10 to register their views about the constitutional future of Canada, and I think to impose such a delay would place an unfair and unjust restriction on senators.

I know that there are many honourable senators who are eager to put on the record of Parliament their views on the subject of the Constitution and patriation. They want to do it now, so that their ideas can be considered properly by the other place and by the country.

Senator Asselin: Name them.

Senator Perrault: I do not believe that the other place should be the sole repository of wisdom and proper judgment with respect to the constitutional future of our nation.

Senator Asselin: Name them.

Senator Perrault: I believe that those senators who wish to participate at the outset of this debate about the future of their country should have that opportunity.

Secondly, honourable senators, I see merit in the proposal that the Senate should not rush to finish its debate on the constitutional proposals under a time schedule which is totally unrelated to the events taking place in the other place.

Senator Asselin: Table a list of your speakers.

Senator Perrault: Yes, honourable senators, and I happen to believe that if good ideas for amendment are originated in this place, they could merit action by us to suggest amendment. If the two chambers are debating concurrently, such an amending proposal could go to the other place and be discussed there and considered for adoption.

So, if the question is whether it is reasonable to hope that we can finish our debate at approximately the same time, or some brief time after the House of Commons, if one believes that there should be an extra margin of Senate debating time in order to permit the well-accepted idea of sober second thought, then I find that that could be a supportable argument. I would hope that we could negotiate with the official opposition and that we could discuss various aspects of the debate in which we will be engaged shortly.

I do not think that the two ideas are incompatible. I think there is a basic understanding in this chamber about what we would like to do with respect to this constitutional package. However, there is a difference of viewpoint about when the debate should begin. I think that difference stems from the views expressed by the Leader of the Opposition, as well as from those expressed by Senators Grosart and Smith. We all have respect for their judgment. However, I think our views differ as to when senators should be permitted to discuss this constitutional package.

Surely, there is a substantial difference between—and I mentioned this yesterday—the ordinary process, which sees a bill which may relate to ports and harbours, or grasshopper control—a bill which may have been studied and passed by the other place and then sent to us so that we could analyze it, refer it to committee, and so forth—and this matter. We are looking at a package of proposals which have been studied in a more detailed fashion than perhaps any other body of constitutional recommendations in the history of Canada. The joint committee has spent hours and weeks on this. For example, Senator Roblin has put in many hours of parliamentary overtime and a great deal of work to bring his views before that committee. Also, Senators Hays, Austin, Lamontagne and Connolly have worked diligently on this matter. Indeed, over 50 senators have participated in the preparation of this report.

Senator Asselin: Did you say Senator Hays?

Senator Perrault: This package has been studied by many members of this chamber already and they are familiar with it in great detail. Many members of this chamber are eager to get on with the debate. We are not asking that a vote be held within 10 days, two weeks or three weeks. However, I think a persuasive argument can be made so that we can proceed in concert with the members of the other place. We are not restricting the right of senators to speak, and we are not going to establish arbitrary time limits. I do not think we can tell any senator to wait until March 10 to say something on the subject of the Constitution.

This is why we find ourselves unable to support this amendment to the main motion.

Senator Molson: May I ask the Leader of the Government a question? He mentioned today, and I think yesterday, that by dealing with this matter at the same time as the other place, if there were some difference in the treatment of some of the matters contained in the resolution we could communicate with them. Unfortunately, there is no machinery that I know of and nothing in the Rules of the Senate which would permit us to do that.

If we were to debate it at the same time and if we could communicate with them, I believe that would be helpful. However, there is no machinery in our rules or in the rules of the Commons which will permit us to do that.

Senator Perrault: First of all, there is always the informal consultative process. Secondly, if the government decides to accept a proposal, which is acceptable to members of the government in both houses, it is much easier to advance that proposal. The government has not rejected the idea of change. This has been said many times.

Senator Asselin: Mr. Chrétien said there would be none.

Senator Perrault: If there is an amendment of merit which comes from the House of Commons or from the Senate, that amendment is going to be considered.

Senator Asselin: Who said that?

Senator Perrault: If the House of Commons were to finish its debate ahead of the Senate, and if it accepted the constitutional package, or accepted it with amendments, and the Senate made amendments to the package different from those made by the House of Commons, then the debate in the House of Commons would have to be re-opened, rescheduled, and the rescinding process would be difficult and complicated.

It seems to me that the proposal to have approximately concurrent debates in both the Senate and the House of Commons meets the utmost test of parliamentary democracy.

As I stated earlier, I think it is unfair to ask honourable senators to stay out of this parliamentary debating process until March 10, March 15 or whatever date, while members of the other place, with an equal background in the study of the constitutional package because of their committee participation, are given a free opportunity to debate.

● (1530)

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government the question that I asked his deputy. In the spirit of good feeling, which he suggested was his approach—it is certainly ours in this matter—would he now give us an assurance that the government in the Senate will not seek to bring this matter to a conclusion before a message has been received from the House of Commons?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I support that principle. However, I would like to discuss it with the Leader of the Opposition to determine whether or not a consensus can be reached. The arguments which I have advanced fully support that idea.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I am impressed by the views my honourable friend, Senator Grosart, has expressed, particularly when he points out that this amendment has the support of the leaders of the other two parties on this side—Senator Manning's and Senator Molson's.

Senator Flynn: We forgot about you.

Senator Lawson: Notwithstanding that, I am in favour of anything that will advance this debate as quickly as possible. While I accept the view of the Leader of the Government with respect to the importance of the debate to the future of Canada, I am in favour of having it completed quickly, but in sufficient detail, so that we can deal with the economic matters facing us and thus assure a future for Canada. Notwithstanding the high regard I have for Senator Molson, Senator Flynn and the leaders of the other party on this side, as a member of the fourth party I am opposed to anything that will delay the debate, and will vote against the amendment.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Just for clarification purposes, I should like to ask the government leader a question concerning amendments because he gave us a very long explanation on the most productive way to propose amendments if the discussions were held simultaneously in both houses. Are the amendments to which he referred, amendments to the proposed resolution which came out of the committee, or are they amendments to the proposed resolution which is included, by itself, I believe, in the Orders of the Day under the heading "Motions"? Something bothers me in this regard. As concerns the committee, which the Leader of the Government congratulated for its very elaborate and careful work, I have noted one thing, namely that the report of the committee, that is the proposed resolution referred back by the committee, is not exactly the same as the proposed resolution which the Leader of the Government presented to the Senate.

I have noted an important difference between the report of the committee and the motion introduced in the name of the Leader of the Government. This point concerns the title of the measure to be laid before the British Parliament, which is "An act to amend the Constitution of Canada" in the committee report.

In the proposed resolution presented by the Leader of the Government, the title is "An act to give effect to a request by the Senate and House of Commons of Canada". There is an obvious difference of contents in the two titles given to the legislation on which this whole operation hinges.

Are we to consider that an amendment has been made according to the report of the committee? Is this how we are to consider the matter? Can we hold a debate here on whether the title should be more substantial to be in accordance with the report of the committee? All these are questions that I would like the Leader of the Government to clarify as concerns the principle of moving amendments and the procedure to follow, because, in fact, a de facto amendment has been made to the report of the committee compared to the motion which has been moved. This concerns the whole procedure for amendments and the question of what can be amended.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, my reference to an amendment was in anticipation of a possible decision in this chamber or in the other place which would in some way change the wording of the resolution or recommend certain changes be made in the measure which has been tabled in the two chambers. At this point in time the government does not anticipate proposing, of its own volition, an amendment or change, but the Prime Minister has said from the outset that the government would always be willing to at least consider amendments should they be required. As I stated a few moments ago, having the two houses debate this measure concurrently aids very much the process of amendment, should that be necessary.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: With your permission, I should like to ask a supplementary question arising from the example I have just given. Could we be assured that between the committee report and the motion before us, there are no substantial amendments other than the one I have indicated? This is a very serious question, because I am under the impression that all those who are called upon to participate in this debate feel that this is the committee report, because the committee had recommended that the text of the resolution which the government would move be the same as that found in its own report. Considering that there is at least one difference which I have noted, could we be assured that no other substantial changes have been made? And in case there are, I ask why that one instead of others? If I ask this question, it is because most people think that we are dealing with the committee report, although I have found a difference between the motion before us and the one which would have strictly resulted from the committee report.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the point is not directly relevant to the motion which is under debate, and I have nothing further to add to my previous remarks.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, having listened to the arguments put forward on this motion, I would like to add a few words. In my heart I cannot believe that the usefulness of the Senate and the good of the country would be advanced by supporting the motion of the Leader of the Opposition. We have before us a measure that has been debated in great detail and with great care by all members of Parliament in both houses for the last couple of months. We have now come to the final crunch, as it were, in this debate. In my view, I cannot see the point of waiting for the other side to make their amendments, and then we, afterwards, deciding what we are going to amend—if we are going to amend—and again waiting for the other house to consider our amendments. Surely we now have our own ideas as to amendments.

At the same time I think it is perfectly obvious that the opposition, as well as we on this side, will have consulted our colleagues in the other house and, in all probability, we will not advance amendments that are totally embarrassing to our party. Therefore, if the opposition is going to propose amendments, they should do so in consultation with their colleagues in the other house. My point is that if there are amendments we wish to make, we should make them now after consultation with our colleagues in the other house. There is no reason why we cannot do that.

I made a speech on the resolution that was proposed a few months ago in which I expressed a number of serious reservations. Happily for me, at least, a lot of my reservations have been resolved by the amendments with which the government has agreed, and which now appear in the present bill. If there are further amendments, both sides should be making them now in consultation with their colleagues. That is the responsible way of approaching this matter, so that we can get on with dealing with the final resolution. That will enable us all the sooner to deal with the other problems that are plaguing this country.

In my view, we in the Senate have really no justification for sitting for four, five or six weeks on this resolution. According to the views expressed in the other place, the opposition there would like at least that period of time to debate the resolution. Therefore, what justification have we to sit here waiting until the resolution has been dealt with in the other place, and then to play the record over again? I am sure we have our own ideas, our own points of view, to put forward. Therefore, let us get on with it; let us do it at the same time, work with our colleagues in the other place, and deal with the resolution satisfactorily.

[Translation]

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, I wish to add one word only to say that, unfortunately, I shall be unable to support my friend Senator Flynn, or Senator Molson; because if I were to do so, we would, as a result, only extend the debate on the Constitution. Personally, I feel that the Canadian people have had more than enough of this constitutional talk: the sooner we get it over with, the better it will be for Canada. Either the proposed resolution will be rejected or accepted by the Queen; or, at a later date, it will be rejected by the Canadian people or the Supreme Court; so, the sooner we settle the matter, the better it will be. As for me, I should like, as Senator Asselin said, us to give it "a sober second thought". At this point, we are on an equal footing with the House of Commons. What they know, we know. The pros and cons of the matter have been given and we are every bit as competent as the House of Commons to discuss the Constitution. For God's sake let's get it over with and put an end to the bickering in Canada. Let's face it: there are as many Canadians for the package as there are against. Therefore, let us settle the matter as soon as possible; prolonging the debate is not getting us anywhere.

Senator Asselin: Just a moment. I don't think that you would talk like that had clause 44 not been deleted in committee.

Senator Denis: What makes you say so?

Senator Asselin: We know what you were saying when clause 44 was part of the document.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. We are discussing all kinds of things except the amendment. I must inform honourable senators that there is an amendment moved by Senator Smith, seconded by Senator Molson:

> That the Senate do not consider approval of the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, or the resolution based on that report, until the eleventh of March.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators opposed to the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it, and I declare the motion in amendment defeated, on division. We will now consider the main motion.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the motion in amendment was defeated on division. As to the main motion—

The Hon. the Speaker: I draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that if the Honourable Senator Flynn speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Flynn: I am sure that suits everyone.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I mentioned, I want to add a few supplementary comments with reference to the main motion.

The Leader of the Opposition, the mover of the motion, divided his observations into three categories of reasons why his motion should be supported. They were precedents, importance and strategy for the Senate. I consider that to be an excellent analysis, but we do not agree on their application. I agree with his analysis of the precedents. As I mentioned in my earlier observations, I believe it is accurate. However, in this case, we must recognize the fact that the precedents cited were themselves at one time not precedents, but became so because they dealt with unusual situations. We are dealing now with a most unusual situation which, in turn, brings me to my second point. I have nothing to add to what he said regarding the importance of this matter, but with regard to the strategy to be adopted by the Senate, my observations with reference to the amendment apply equally here.

I agree that there is an attractive argument for our working toward simultaneous, or even second, disposition of the motion by the Senate—that is, that the Senate should have the last word. The question of timing is something that I have already started to discuss with the Leader of the Opposition. I hope that we can come to an arrangement that will meet his requirements and those of his colleagues, and also the requirements and wishes of the government and its supporters, and that will not lead to extended hours in respect of meeting the undertaking or arrangement that we might be able to make. If we can reach some kind of agreement that will fulfil all the requirements for debate on this important issue, we might also be able to make some arrangements with regard to sitting normal hours and not extending the hours unless it is necessary to meet those objectives.

I wish to assure honourable senators that that is the objective of both the Leader of the Opposition and those on this side. I hope we can reach that objective, and I do not want the defeat of this motion, if it is defeated, to be construed as slamming the door on any of those initiatives.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Denis that many people on both sides of the issue are tired of discussing this matter. But that is not a valid reason for the Senate's refusing to deal with this matter in the normal way. We should be discussing and disposing of this motion only after the House of Commons has decided upon it. If the House rejected the resolution in principle—and that is always possible—that would be the end of it, and we would not have the problem of discussing it. I do not mind Senator Neiman's expressing her views on the question right away, but it would be rather useless if a message were not to come to us from the other place asking us to concur in the resolution.

However, I must acknowledge that what the Deputy Leader of the Government has said is very reasonable if we set aside the principle I am defending with this motion. Therefore, I want a recorded vote to be taken on this motion because there is a principle involved, and I believe the Senate should be made to take a position. If the Senate says no, I am quite sure that we will be able to agree upon an orderly manner in which to discuss and dispose of this question.

● (1550)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald, that the Senate do not consider approval of the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, or the resolution based on that report, before the House of Commons has disposed of them.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators opposed to the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

Motion of Senator Flynn negatived on the following division:

Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE—CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN MINISTER OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT AND U.S. SECRETARY OF ENERGY TABLED

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to table, and then distribute copies of, two letters, one from Mr. Edwards, the new Secretary of Energy of the United States of America, and my reply.

Senator Olson then tabled:

Correspondence between the Honourable H. A. (Bud) Olson, Minister of State for Economic Development, and James B. Edwards, U.S. Secretary of Energy, with respect to the Alaska Highway Gas Pipeline Project.

Senator Olson: If I may have leave, honourable senators, I will read the letters now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the first letter is dated February 6, 1981, and is addressed to me as Minister of State for Economic Development. The text is as follows:

> I am pleased to write to you today on the occasion of the ceremony marking initial construction in the United States of the Western Leg of the Alaska Natural Gas Transportation System (ANGTS). This milestone and the excellent prospects for rapid completion of the entire prebuild are evidence of the continuing cooperation between our countries that will help assure success of the entire system.
> I would like to take this opportunity to state again that the United States Government is firmly committed to the completion of ANGTS in conformity with agreements between our countries. We expect the United States sponsors and producers will soon reach an agreement on a tentative financing plan. This agreement will be a major step toward arranging private financing and obtaining final regulatory approvals for construction of the Alaskan segment.
> I look forward to working with you to complete the remaining steps on the way to accomplishment of this important project.

That letter is signed by James B. Edwards, Secretary of Energy of the United States.

My reply reads as follows:

> Dear Secretary Edwards:
> I wish to acknowledge and to thank you for your letter of February 6. With construction underway on the southern sections of the pipeline in both Canada and the United States, we in Canada are confident that the entire line will be completed in a timely manner.
> I was pleased to note in your letter the commitment of President Reagan's Administration to the line. I am certain that when the President visits Ottawa in the near future he and the Prime Minister will have an opportunity to review the significant progress to date and discuss the further actions required on both sides of the border.
> I too look forward to working with you towards the completion of the entire line by our two countries.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, February 24, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

RESOLUTION FOR ADDRESS—VOTING PROCEDURE IN SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, due to the regrettable absence of the Leader of the Government, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): He is on government business.

Senator Flynn: Of course; where else would he be?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): The adjective is appreciated.

Senator Flynn: I hope it will be appreciated by the government leader as well.

Senator Frith: I will pass it on.

Senator Flynn: The Prime Minister indicated in the other place that he would not allow a free vote on the Constitution resolution. Would the Deputy Leader of the Government tell us if this rule also applies to Liberal senators in this place?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I will have to study that question, particularly its use of such words as "allow". I will take the question as notice.

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENT BY PREMIER OF SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I wonder if I may raise a question of privilege which I had intended to raise prior to Question Period. It deals with the statement made today by Premier Allan Blakeney with regard to the withdrawal of his support for the constitutional package. My question of privilege relates to the fact that he attributes certain actions to the Senate and to some senators. In his press release he makes a statement which I believe is wrong. I do not believe that either the statement or what Mr. Blakeney purports in the press release went on among the senators should go unchallenged.

I refer specifically to his claim to have some inside knowledge about certain pressures put on the Prime Minister by Liberal senators with regard to section 44. He further states that under the present constitutional package, as amended, the Senate will have enhanced or increased powers.

I believe that it is out of line for the Premier of Saskatchewan to attribute any motives to the Senate, especially when his motives all along, and particularly now, are open to serious question. Why has the Premier of Saskatchewan dragged his feet? Why does he now choose not to support this package? Perhaps it is to split his party and enhance his own position, thereby saving his political hide in Saskatchewan. But that is for the public to decide.

I resent very much the statements made by Premier Blakeney on the rightness or wrongness of something which may or may not have happened or on any actions taken by senators on either side of the house. I do not think he knows what he is talking about, and he proved it when he made his statement this morning. If Premier Blakeney has decided not to support the constitutional package, that is his privilege and I do not question it. However, since he questions our motives, and since I am one of the senators whose motives he obviously questions, I believe that we have an equal right to question his motives and cast some doubt on the honesty and veracity of his statement.

I make it clear that I do not agree with his statement that the powers of the Senate, through the deletion of section 44, are in fact enhanced or enlarged. I would like to make that very clear. As a senator from Saskatchewan, I largely supported Premier Blakeney's position. I am bitterly disappointed that Premier Blakeney has decided, for his own political purposes, to back away and put in jeopardy the controls over resources for which we fought so hard and which he claimed he would support if they were included in the package. We have them now, but he has chosen to back away. He has probably put in jeopardy that power which we in Saskatchewan wanted so badly.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, on the question of privilege, may I suggest to the honourable senator that it is difficult to understand the question without hearing the words of the press release? Would the honourable senator read the press release, so that we may have a full comprehension of the point of privilege he has raised?

Senator Steuart: I would be delighted to read that particular part. There is a great deal in error in the whole thing. However, I will not bore the Senate by reading the whole thing, because it is a mish-mash of misinformation and questionable philosophy. I will read into the record the part to which I referred in particular. There is so much at fault that it is difficult to begin.

> So we were happy with this provision, contained in section 44.
> But apparently many of the senators weren't, including Liberals. Twenty of those Liberal senators, so it is reported, gave the Prime Minister an ultimatum: they said, either remove section 44, or they would break party ranks and defeat the resolution in the Senate.

Senator Flynn: That is not possible.

Senator Steuart: No, there are at least 24 senators.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame, shame.

Senator Steuart: He goes on to state:

> Let me be clear about the implications of removing this section. It doesn't just maintain the status quo, deferring reform of the Senate to some future time. It actually enhances Senate power, perhaps for all time.

That is what I disagree with. He claims to be a constitutional lawyer, so he should know about these things. In fact, he is wrong. Again he is using it as a red herring.

Senator Frith: To enhance his own political ends.

Senator Flynn: May I ask Senator Steuart whether his point of privilege was brought up at this time because of my question relating to the free vote by Liberal senators?

Senator Steuart: I meant to bring it up before Question Period, but Senator Flynn sprang to his feet and beat me to it.

Senator Flynn: That is easy to do.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

DISCUSSION OF CANADIAN ENERGY AND FOREIGN INVESTMENT POLICIES

Hon. Martial Asselin: Yesterday, I put a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Upon reading his answer, it appeared to me that the minister has cleverly avoided answering. So if he has no objection, I will put the question to him again today.

Yesterday, I quoted the United States Special Trade Commissioner Bill Brock as saying:

> We have a number of difficulties with respect to Canada. We want to talk about the foreign review agency and the energy policies.

In reply, as reported in Hansard, the minister said that it was a bit unfair to suggest that we are having difficulties with the United States administration, and that does not answer my question. The minister does not seem to realize that Mr. Brock is the equivalent of a cabinet minister in the U.S. So there is some credibility to what he says on behalf of the American government.

I would like to repeat my question: would the minister make inquiries and inform the Senate of the particular difficulties that exist with the Reagan administration with respect to our energy policy and our foreign investment policy?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I think I gave an undertaking yesterday to the effect that I would try to obtain some specific information about the allegations made by the honourable senator and obviously attributed to an official, if that information was available.

The honourable senator can flash press releases in front of me, but he knows that the rules do not permit him to ask or a minister to reply to questions about whether or not statements in the press are true.

Setting that aside, I take his question standing by itself as to whether we would look into the matter to see whether there have been any communications from the new administration objecting to some of our energy and financial policies. I think I gave that undertaking yesterday. I will bring that reply to the Senate. Indeed, I think the honourable senator also asked—and I do not have that question in front of me—whether or not it was going to be on the agenda for discussions between the President and the Prime Minister when they meet on March 10. I also gave him an undertaking that the usual practice would be followed. Obviously I was not prepared to go beyond that. I will find out whether I can draw to the attention of this house those matters that are proposed for inclusion on the agenda. My undertaking is just as strong today as it was yesterday.

• (1420)

Senator Asselin: Can the minister assure the Senate that he will report on this question before the visit of the President of the United States on March 10?

Senator Olson: I can give him an undertaking that I will try.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I was just wondering, honourable senators, if the minister rose seriously on that point of order concerning the quoting of press releases, and a minister's not having to respond in such cases.

I agree with the last part, to the effect that the honourable minister does not have to respond. He never does, no matter what the question relates to, press releases or not, but is he really making a formal objection? Because it would be very easy to change the form of a question and say that a certain thing was said. Are you seriously objecting to it?

Senator Olson: I am seriously objecting to this extent, that I would like the honourable gentlemen opposite to follow the rules of this house as meticulously as I do.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Olson: The rule is very clear. It puts the onus on the senator asking the question even more firmly than on the minister replying, and I refer you to Beauchesne's fifth edition at citation No. 357, which says:

> 357. (1) The traditional restrictions on questions are those listed in Beauchesne's Fourth Edition at citation 171—

It goes on to say:

> "A question oral or written must not:—

That is emphasized: "must not", and this is referring to the context in which the question is being asked, and not the reply.

> "A question oral or written must not: ... (e) inquire whether statements made in a newspaper are true.

And there we are.

Senator Flynn: That is the point. So if we referred only to the statement, without mentioning the newspaper, you would not object.

Senator Olson: Of course not; but the honourable gentlemen opposite would then have to find some other foundation on which to base their preamble to the question.

There is another part of those Standing Orders that says—

Senator Flynn: You mean Beauchesne, not Standing Orders.

Senator Olson: —that the preamble to a question must not be a speech, no matter how short.

Senator Asselin: I want to remind the minister that I did not quote from a clipping. I was quoting what Mr. Brock said in a conference. This situation, therefore, is different from the one covered in the ruling the minister has been trying to explain.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Could I ask the honourable the minister if he was quoting the Rules of the Senate?

Senator Olson: No, I was quoting the rules as to Question Period listed in Beauchesne's fifth edition.

If my honourable friend has any trouble with that, all he has to do is look at rule 1 of Rules of the Senate which says that unless otherwise provided we follow the rules of the other place, and it is not so provided in our rules.

Senator Grosart: Just on that point, we do not have standing orders here. The honourable senator quoted "standing order" No. 1. I am quite sure he meant "rule" No. 1.

In the second place, he has just made the statement to the house—this is as a matter of clarification—that our rules say that if a matter is not provided for in our rules we follow the rules of the House of Commons. We have no rule of that kind whatsoever, unless it has been put into our rules since the last printing. The rule says something quite different from saying that we must follow the rules of the House of Commons.

Senator Olson: In case the honourable senator has not read the rule lately, perhaps I should recite it to him, although I am sure he has a copy of the rules in his own desk. The rule says:

> 1. In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada—

And that includes, obviously, the House of Commons.

> —shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

The nit-picking that is going on with respect to whether the House of Commons is included in the Houses of Parliament is not tenable, according to my logic.

Senator Grosart: It says "either House", and if the rule can be covered by our conventions and customs here, it is an entirely different matter. I draw that to his attention.

Senator Roblin: Quite so.

Senator Olson: And I draw it to his attention that it is not.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I could hardly let such a glorious occasion go by without intervening. I would like to address a remark or two on a point of order.

To start with, let me inform Senator Olson that I absolutely reject the authority which he quoted as having anything to do with this question whatsoever. The honourable gentleman just read rule 1, which says:

> In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, . . . be followed—

This is one of them. The customs and usages which he himself followed for some nine months when he sat on this side of the house utilized to the full not only newspaper reports but also every other invention he could think of to lengthen his questions.

Senator Asselin: Right on the nose.

Senator Smith: The customs and usages which he followed and which he greatly enlarged upon are surely as open to the opposition of this day as they were to the opposition of his day.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have to draw to the attention of the Honourable Senator Smith that there are levels of provocation which are more extreme in some cases than in others.

Senator Flynn: In your case.

Senator Olson: I suggest that is a very significant difference. In addition to that, I do not believe the action of one senator, even if it happens to be me, automatically changes the rules of the house. It was up to the Leader of the Government at that time, and whoever else was supporting him from that side, to raise objections if they were unhappy with the way the questions were asked, and indeed you were not unhappy.

Senator Flynn: That is the difference: we are not unhappy.

Senator Olson: I will have to remind the honourable gentlemen opposite that it is not sufficient excuse, in my view, to suggest that they can get away with things simply because I did.

Senator Flynn: I would draw the attention of the minister to the fact that the previous government was very much in favour of freedom of information. That may be the difference between the minister's approach and ours when we were on the other side.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I take this seriously.

Senator Flynn: We will take you seriously.

Senator Olson: Adherence to the rules that have been agreed to by all senators is a high priority of this government. They can speak for what they were doing when they were on this side, but the rules have been set down and accepted by both the House of Commons and the Senate—it is a tradition—and I am just pleading that they follow them. Some of the recent flagrant violations—

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh.

Senator Olson: —of how to ask questions have, in fact, moved the Question Period into a period of debate. I am trying to bring it back a little.

Senator Smith: So far as I am concerned, I reject out of hand, completely and forever, the argument of the honourable gentleman, and he need not think that he has convinced anybody by his strange conversion.

EDUCATION

FEDERAL GRANTS TO POST-SECONDARY INSTITUTIONS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I do not want to interrupt or terminate this contretemps because I am enjoying it immensely. When Senator Olson read the book to us, it reminded me of what I was told long, long ago, even before the days of Senator Lamontagne, when I was a very junior university lecturer. My boss said: "If you don't know your subject when you go into a classroom, read the textbook." I am wondering if that was not proven today.

My question is for the Deputy Leader of the Government, and I am reverting to a matter which concerns me a great deal. Being so careful of what Senator Olson said, it is not founded on a newspaper item at all. I did note Geoff Stevens' interesting column this morning, and he was right in the first sentence and wrong in all the rest. He is right because he is repeating what I have been thinking for a long, long time—

Senator Olson: That doesn't make it right.

Senator Macquarrie: —that what is in likelihood in view for the post-secondary education institutions of this country is far more important, far more serious and probably far more dangerous than anything that will happen in the Constitution.

I therefore ask the deputy leader if he can give us some assurance that somebody is listening to the educationists in the country. Further, can he find an avenue whereby this house can find some way to influence these people who are prepared, I fear, to cut back outrageously, unnecessarily and dangerously on the grants to the post-secondary institutions? Failing all of that, can he find some arrangements whereby the Senate of Canada can be informed before it is too late?

● (1430)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on the principle that questions properly asked must elicit information, my difficulty is that it will immediately become apparent that the questioner is much more informed on this subject than I am. But first of all, I will try to assure him that someone is listening. I certainly hope so because I know what his concern is. As to the Senate's dealing with this admittedly important matter, it occurs to me that it could be the subject of an inquiry. I believe the estimates will also be before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, and it may be that its study will raise this question. Those are two suggestions, and I will try to co-operate with any method that the honourable senator can find to bring this question to the attention of the Senate.

Senator Macquarrie: I would like to say, honourable senators, that I accept, approve of and praise the honourable senator's reply in all its implications, analogies and appraisals, not excepting those about myself! However, I wonder if we might in this instance give thought to emulating the other place and setting in motion an inquiry, a study by a task force, or whatever designation we use, for some senators to look into this matter very carefully and very quickly. I think Senator Cameron, Senator Lamontagne and many people on this side would be most anxious to be helpful, co-operative and alert.

Senator Frith: That could be a logical result of any of the other initiatives I suggested.

GRAIN

CROWSNEST RATES

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Senator Flynn: Indeed.

Senator Roblin: Does he know about it?

Senator Buckwold: I have not even asked my question yet. This house is perhaps getting tired of listening to questions about and discussions on the Crow rate—

Senator Roblin: No, never.

Senator Buckwold: Of course, the opposition is used to eating crow so they are well acquainted with it.

Senator Flynn: You do not offer anything else to us.

Senator Buckwold: My question to the minister is a serious one. The western grain-producing provinces are very confused at present with the multiplicity of statements which are coming from a variety of political leaders, provincial leaders, farm organization leaders and transportation experts on what is happening and is likely to happen to the Crow rate. I am really asking the question for the record, so that we can hear from the minister in words which I know will be emblazoned across the press of western Canada, and so that we will know the facts as to any new directions which may be taken with regard to the Crow rate.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I think some of the confusion in western Canada with regard to recent developments stems from a story from Ottawa appearing in a Regina—

Senator Roblin: A newspaper—oh! no, you cannot do that! Oh, no!

Senator Argue: I have not quoted the story. I said—well, let's smile and get on with the business of the house. We all quote from newspapers; let's not fool ourselves.

Senator Roblin: You had better get permission from Senator Olson.

Senator Argue: The Senate is a great place. We have a lot of fun here. The press does not realize just how well we do.

At any rate, I do believe this story has caused confusion in western Canada, where the main story coming out of Ottawa seemed to infer that there could be action on the Crow which was being held up because provincial premiers did not agree. The headline says:

> Blakeney seen key to ending standoff on Crowsnest rates

Since Premier Blakeney has not been too forthright on constitutional questions, I think it would create uncertainty if this whole issue were left to the Premier of Saskatchewan. However, the Saskatchewan Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable Gordon MacMurchy—who is not referred to in this story—makes it perfectly clear that the policy of that province is to continue to oppose any increases in the Crowsnest rates.

In reply to Senator Buckwold's question, the policy of the government was made quite clear in Commons Hansard of February 13 when the Prime Minister made a statement as part of a general statement on the Crowsnest rates. At page 7212 of Hansard of that date, the Prime Minister stated:

> I told them—

"Them" refers to the farm leaders.

> —and yesterday I said it publicly—that we do not want to fiddle with the Crow rate unless there is some very strong feeling throughout the west that this rate should be reopened and the question re-examined.

He went on to say he told them:

> —if you want the Crow rate to be reopened and re-examined, you had better say it loud and clear because we will not do it on our own initiative.

I would also quote from the next page where Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert) said:

> Madam Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. It concerns the question put by the hon. member for Provencher, and it is really supplementary to it. With regard to the speech given on Wednesday by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board in which he unequivocally supported the continuation of the Crowsnest freight rate, it is clear that the minister was speaking for cabinet when he made that policy statement that there will be no changes in the Crow rate?

Although it was put that way it was a question. The Right Honourable the Prime Minister replied:

> Madam Speaker, I believe that that is the answer I gave a moment ago. At present there is no decision and no intention in cabinet to change the Crow rate. I understand that even the western premiers cannot agree on whether or not it should be changed. Apparently the province of Saskatchewan is opposed to any change. The other two prairie provinces want change.

I have said that among the leaders who were part of the so-called "WAC consensus" there is obviously still a very substantial difference in attitude, one of the major organizations disagreeing with some of the other organizations in that group, saying that there cannot be any task force. Perhaps not all of the organizations, but certainly some of them, made it absolutely clear that they would not consider, at any time, a variable rate structure.

I must say that I think the position taken by the Prime Minister is realistic. I believe it means exactly what it says, namely, that as far as the Government of Canada is concerned it will not fiddle with the Crow rate unless and until there is a general consensus among people in western Canada that it should be changed, a change that would make it possible for producers themselves, in the future, to assume an increasing burden for the transportation of grain.

I think that is a much clearer position than the position contained in the article to which Senator Buckwold and I have made reference.

EMBARGO ON SALES TO U.S.S.R.—COMPENSATION TO FARMERS

Hon. Lowell Murray: I would ask the Minister of State for the Wheat Board whether a decision has been reached by the government as to whether and how the government's commitment to pay compensation to the grain growers for the period of the embargo will be carried out.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I am not able to say, today, precisely when that decision will be made. I find that the system of government is rather complicated, slow, and contains, as the former minister would certainly know, very many levels of decision-making or recommendation before a matter progresses to the stage of a cabinet decision.

On the principle of compensation, I believe that compensation will be paid. I am optimistic enough to believe that the decision will be realistic and will answer this question in a very accurate manner.

• (1440)

Senator Murray: With great respect, honourable senators, here we go again. The Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, who presumably is the minister responsible in this area, says that he is optimistic that compensation will be paid.

Senator Argue: Right.

Senator Murray: There is no question but that compensation will be paid. There is a firm commitment on the part of the Government of Canada through the instrumentality of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture speaking in the House of Commons; also the minister in this chamber has stated pretty firmly that that is a commitment by the government. I want him to confirm that the government is committed to paying compensation to those farmers in respect of the period during which the embargo was in force. Having made that commitment, we can then get on a little later with the timing and nature of the compensation to be paid.

Senator Argue: Well, the record is clear, and we do not have to go over it. Based on the record, I say that I am most optimistic. I put in—

Senator Murray: Not that you are optimistic, but that compensation is going to be paid. Does that commitment stand or doesn't it? I am not interested in my honourable friend's optimism; I am interested in the official, solemn commitment of the Government of Canada in this regard, and I ask the minister to reaffirm it.

Senator Olson: There is nothing wrong with our memory, you know. We remember what we said.

Senator Argue: The honourable senator does not seem to know one rule of the Senate, namely, that when one senator has the floor, another senator is not at liberty to stand up and take the floor.

Senator Flynn: You should have resumed your seat.

Senator Argue: Oh no. There was no request that I should be interrupted. But my honourable friend is rather new here; so I don't mind.

Senator Flynn: The legalistic pair.

Senator Argue: I come back to my statement.

Senator Flynn: Good.

Senator Argue: I am most optimistic. You know, Senator Olson, I believe our batting average has been excellent in western Canada for those things for which we have stood and fought. The world will unfold and we will see whether Senator Murray's pessimism is warranted or whether my own optimism is justified.

Senator Flynn: No answer. The legalistic pair.

Senator Argue: We are two farmers.

TRANSPORT

DOUBLE TRACKING OF CNR FROM WINNIPEG TO VANCOUVER

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, may I address a question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board and test his optimism in this regard? When does the minister expect the commitment made by the Prime Minister of Canada in Estevan, Saskatchewan, during the last election campaign, to double track the CNR from Winnipeg to Vancouver, to be implemented?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, there is a lot of snickering about double tracking. With other ministers, I had the privilege last fall of travelling on the CNR on the west coast and through the mountains. The CNR has some aggressive plans to provide double tracking, I believe, from Edmonton through to Vancouver on certain portions that require double tracking. The CNR understands that the freight traffic on the railroads in western Canada is growing so rapidly that within the next few years, perhaps four or five, there must be a substantial measure of double tracking, that more double tracking will take place from year to year, and that by the year 2000—some honourable senators may giggle; that is 19 years away—the whole system will be double tracked.

So, double tracking is not foolishness. Double tracking is absolutely essential for the railroads to handle the tremendous increase in traffic that everyone who understands the system can foresee. I admit it will not be this year or the next, but it is on the way, and there are certain major sections in British Columbia that require double tracking forthwith.

Senator Flynn: In the meantime the government is sidetracking.

Senator Olson: No, it is doing it right now.

Senator Argue: The CNR is the best run railroad in the world, bar none.

ENERGY

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF PETROFINA CANADA INC.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of State for Economic Development relating to his ecstatic response to a question asked yesterday concerning the profits of Petrofina Canada. It was stated that Petrofina had a profit of $98 million last year. Of course, the government would probably get 50 per cent of that in taxes. I am at a loss to understand the optimism of the minister concerning the investment when one considers the purchase of a company such as Petrofina for $1.5 billion and $50 million will be paid to the government in taxes. That leaves approximately $45 million to $48 million. According to my calculations, that is a return of approximately 3 per cent.

If PetroCan is going to borrow money on the market, approximately $1.5 billion, at possibly 14 per cent interest, I find the minister's optimism a little far-fetched. I was wondering if that is the way the government is calculating the yield on its investment, namely, by getting 3 per cent and paying 14 per cent. Can the minister tell us the logic of that?

Senator Flynn: I doubt it.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators can adopt that line of thinking and they will obviously come to the wrong conclusion, as has my honourable friend; or they can do it the other way and add up the total assets of Petrofina, including what its cash flow may be, as one of the assets—but there are a great many more. They can then divide that by the amount of equity that Petro-Canada would be obtaining. I am sure my honourable friend would then agree that, on balance, this is a good and satisfactory deal.

Senator Flynn: An enlightening answer.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO CHRYSLER CORPORATION—AMENDED AND RESTATED LOAN INSURANCE AGREEMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, in a question asked yesterday concerning the new agreement between Chrysler and the Canadian government, several senators, including Senator Doody, inquired about the level of support through loan guarantees which will be provided by the government, and, related to this, the total amount of investment in Canada being committed by the company and its U.S. parent.

Also yesterday I tabled a statement by my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, along with the amended agreement between Chrysler and the Canadian government and the revised operating and financing plan of Chrysler Canada Ltd.

On the specific details, I would refer honourable senators to that material for guidance. Senator Doody mentioned the figure of $681 million. This refers to planned expenditures by Chrysler Canada only, in Canada, through 1985. These expenditures are detailed in the company's revised operating plan.

In support of these investments, the federal government is making available a total of $150 million in loan guarantees in 1983 and 1984. That $150 million consists of $100 million for the van/wagon project and $50 million for the K car project.

Reference was made yesterday to an additional $50 million in loan guarantees over and above this. That will be available only if, and to the extent that, significant projects, such as the reopening of the Windsor engine plant, are introduced by Chrysler into its plan and are acceptable to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

With specific reference to the question raised by Senator Balfour, I am assuming that the honourable senator was referring to Chrysler's production-to-sales ratio requirements under the Auto Pact.

As my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, has indicated, it is not the intent of the government to penalize the company during its current difficulties.

Given the complexity of the issue and the fact that there will be continuing consultations amongst the parties concerned, including the United States—which, I am sure, honourable senators would not wish to prejudice—I am limiting my remarks to what I have said and would refer honourable senators to the agreement.

THE CONSTITUTION

ABBREVIATED FORM OF MOTION FOR ADDRESS AUTHORIZED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with your permission I should like briefly to deal with a housekeeping problem. Honourable senators will have noticed that, since the introduction of the motion for the Address to Her Majesty, the full motion and the full text of the Constitution Act, 1981, and all of the provisions including the appendices, are printed each day. The like situation has obtained in the other place, but they solved their problem yesterday by passing an order to the effect that the entire material I have referred to will be printed only at the beginning of each week, and all that will appear then in the Votes and Proceedings of the House—which is their version of our Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate—will be the following short statement:

> The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

Without wishing to follow slavishly what they do there, we could adopt the same procedure here. To that end, I have conferred with my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, and I understand that he is willing to second a motion that I should like to put.

I ask leave to move:

> That it be ordered that the motion for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada be printed in the following abbreviated form in the Orders of the Day, the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Debates of the Senate:
> "Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:
> That an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.", > and that the full text of the main motion be printed in the Orders of the Day for the first sitting day of each week; that the full text of any motion in amendment be printed each day until disposed of; and that the full text of the main motion be printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for the day a vote is taken on an amendment and for the day that the main motion is finally disposed of.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, why is it felt necessary to republish the entire text every Tuesday? That only has the effect of avoiding its publication on Wednesdays and Thursdays, and it has already been published several times and will also be republished each time an amendment is moved.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the reason for publishing it at the beginning of each week is that the debate will be recommenced each week and it is expected that the matter will be on the Orders of the Day each week. However, if it is the wish of the Senate to make an order requiring us not to reprint it at all, I would be content with that. I suggest, though, that we try the procedure set out in my motion for a week or two, and if that, too, seems burdensome, perhaps we could dispense with it at that point.

Senator Godfrey: I was not suggesting that it not be reprinted at all but that we could simply do away with its being reprinted automatically.

Senator Frith: It would be reprinted automatically only at the first of each week.

Senator Godfrey: Because it will be reprinted when amendments are moved, I thought that the automatic reprinting on Tuesdays could also be done away with.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to confirm that I do agree with the Deputy Leader of the Government on this motion. I should also like to suggest that the matter be considered by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, which could deal not only with this particular problem and the suggestion made by Senator Godfrey but also with the problem of other matters that remain on the order paper for lengthy periods of time, which is both costly and useless.

I am not, incidentally, criticizing senators for having questions that are long outstanding. For instance, I am certainly not criticizing Senator Macquarrie because he has questions concerning Irish moss which have been in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate since last May; but I suppose that if they had been printed once every two weeks or so that would have been sufficient. In other words, there is the problem of economy. However, I realize that there would also be a problem, from the individual senator's point of view, that senators desire to have their questions replied to as quickly as possible, and that might require having their questions printed frequently.

In any event, I think the whole problem should be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, and that for the time being we should adopt Senator Frith's motion.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I support the observations made by the Leader of the Opposition on the additional matters.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: I should like to say to the Honourable Senator Flynn that I can sympathize with him in respect of Senator Macquarrie's not receiving an answer to his questions, because I put a question, I believe it was five times, to Senator de Cotret when he was sitting on this side, and I still have not had an answer. It just occurs to me that perhaps Senator Flynn could get an answer for me some time.

Senator Flynn: I think that would be rather irregular, but I find it interesting. It might be more appropriate if you were to put your question to the new administration, since it has had more time to deal with the question than we had.

Senator Everett: That is a good point; I will do that.

Senator Frith: You might have to wait a long time, if you wait for another administration to deal with the question.

Motion agreed to.

[Senator Godfrey.]

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, February 10, the debate on the motion of Senator McIlraith for the second reading of Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am bold enough to trespass on your patience this afternoon to discuss Bill C-54, although I know there are other important matters scheduled to come to our attention today. It has been a long time since this bill had its genesis in October of last year, and I sometimes wonder what the relevancy of a debate can be after such a period has elapsed.

Nevertheless, it may be useful to acknowledge the fact that I was much interested in the introduction of Bill C-54, which was presented to us, if I may say so, in a proper and commendable manner by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, who gave us an abbreviated reprise of the budget introduction of October of last year.

I must say that when I listened to Senator McIlraith I thought of that old wedding jingle that we all know: "Something old, something new, something borrowed, something blue." That, in a few words, describes my opinion of the budget speech that we heard last year. As you will gather from the tenor of my remarks, mine is not an altogether favourable opinion, because Bill C-54, in spite of the jingle, is no happy marriage of progressive economic forces, but rather a sullen union of inflation and unemployment.

The borrowed items stand out pretty clearly. They all come from the Progressive Conservative budget of November, 1979. I will mention some of them. The tax credit relief to be provided in respect of wages for spouses surfaced again in October, and I am glad of that. It was good to know that recognition was given to the work of volunteer firemen, not an important matter in terms of dollars but important socially, and I am glad of that. I was happy to see in that budget, too, a repeat of the proposal of the Progressive Conservative government that there should be a form of interest relief for the small business sector of our economy. Heaven knows that in these days of interest rates of unheard of proportions such a consideration is justified. I am glad to see that some of these happily borrowed items survived from the notorious—I think that is the correct word—the notorious budget of Mr. Crosbie of December, 1979. But if that is all that was borrowed, then I believe the taxpayers are entitled to feel not only a little blue but a little bruised. The October statement included no relief from energy taxes and energy pricing problems, or for people in the lower half of our income structure. It seems so long ago that perhaps we should remind ourselves of what was included in the budget of 1979, of which the deputy government leader does not approve, although I believe it commends itself more to him than he thinks.

That budget provided monthly $80 per adult and $30 per child in protection against energy price increases. Everyone agrees that this protection is essential for those people who have incomes of less than $21,000. However, that provision is gone. It also provided tax relief on home mortgages to a good many people in this country. Those two very highly progressive policies went down when the Clark government went down.

I for one regret it because, as a result, the taxpayers are facing higher costs, particularly those taxpayers in lower income groups, than might otherwise be the case.

What is new in the budget? There are some new taxes. I will not get into the taxes which arise as a result of the government's energy policy, because that will be the subject of another debate. If there is something old in the budget it is the same old features of a steady increase in the deficit, in the national debt, in the crushing interest carrying charges and in the cost of living. Unfortunately, there has also been a steady increase in the number of unemployed in this country, although I hope that this situation will alter.

It is perhaps important to spend a little time on the Crosbie budget because it was not discussed very much in this chamber. There are certain aspects of that budget which deserve to be remembered because they deserved to be copied. The Summer 1980 issue of Canadian Taxation included an examination of the Crosbie budget of 1979. It had some interesting things to say which I think are worth repeating. In an article at page 112 of that journal, entitled "The Effects of Federal Budgetary Policies 1978-80 on the Distribution of Income in Canada", its position is summarized in the following terms:

> The Progressive Conservative government brought down its first budget on December 11, 1979. Two days later, it was defeated on the budget in the House of Commons on a nonconfidence motion. The government's budget was attacked, in the main, on the grounds that it was regressive. In this article, Andrew Doman, using a technique pioneered by W. Irwin Gillespie, reaches the surprising conclusion that the defeated Conservative budget was more progressive than any budget introduced by Liberal governments over the past ten years.

I think that is perhaps a striking observation and finding with regard to that budget. Unfortunately, because of the government's collapse and the time element involved, the people never really had an opportunity to understand what was included in that budget or its implications upon them. This article, which I commend to those who might be interested, compares the ten years of Liberal budgetary policy with the Progressive Conservative budget of 1979, and comes down very heartily in favour of the latter—that is, if you believe in an element of fairness and redistribution in budget, and I certainly do.

It points out in detail that the lower income groups in this country received a fairer deal under that budget than in any preceeding budget of the past 10 years, or in the present budget which we are discussing today. It was strongly progressive. If it had been enacted, it would have produced an important shift of tax burden away from the middle-income earners.

The issues of the election and that budget became encapsulated, at least in the Province of Ontario, in the expression "18 cents", which refers to the increase in the price of a gallon of gas. That is why the budget was turned down and why the Liberals were re-elected.

It will be cold comfort to those who voted for the Liberals because they will still have to pay the 18 cents per gallon. It makes no difference that Crosbie was replaced by MacEachen, these people will get it and they will get a lot more. As a result of the MacEachen budget people will have to pay more taxes than under the Crosbie budget. I am sure that those who voted for the Liberals were not counting on this occurrence. If the public had had some time to understand what was in the Crosbie budget, there may have been a different result in that election. However, these are reflections on the past which can never be recaptured.

Senator Flynn: The lie was too big.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps you are right. In any event, the past can never be recaptured, although I have no embarrassment in repeating and in stating the situation here because I believe it to be correct. However, let us move on to the MacEachen budget because that is the one which is of interest today.

The Canadian Council on Social Development had something to say about that budget. It is a well-known body and I am sure it is known to members of this chamber as being responsible and perceptive in its observations about government policy, in particular as they affect the lower income group of people in Canada. They tell the tax story of the poor very well. This body made a presentation to this government after the presentation of its October budget and placed before it the evidence of the budget's negative effect—and I repeat the word "negative"—on the poorer people of Canada.

They chose as an example a family living on a minimum wage income. Minimum wage varies across the country, but the average figure they struck is $6,200 per family. Through their calculations they made it clear that the budget introduced by Mr. MacEachen, which we are being asked to approve when we vote for this bill before us today, increased their cost of living by $496 per family, and it was all as a result of the implications and impositions of this budget.

This budget imposes an 8 per cent charge on the gross income of minimum wage earners in order to pay for the measures which we are being asked to approve here today. The Canadian Council on Social Development goes on to offer the opinion that it is more advantageous for some of these people to go on welfare than to continue working under the conditions imposed by this budget. I hope that will not be the case. The major components of this $496 burden on this particular group are quite clear. One of them is energy costs which amount to $350. I will not pretend that energy is a cost factor which can be stabilized. Energy costs cannot be stabilized and they will continue to go up.

The fact is there is no buffer to protect these people from the incidence of this situation. The Crosbie budget included the energy tax credit buffer which would have helped to equalize the cost and to share the burden of these people. That tax credit was not universal. It did not apply to me, nor should it apply to me, but it applied to many other people who are entitled to that kind of help from the rest of us.

Because such a measure was not included in this budget, those people in the minimum wage category are carrying an intolerable burden of an 8 per cent loss of their gross income, which amounts to $496 and which is more than they would have paid under the Crosbie budget. I put it to this house that this situation cannot be glossed over. There has been an increase in the guaranteed income supplement. I supported that increase, but it must be noted that it has quickly been wiped out by the cost of living, and as a result those people are back where they started. Many of these people may not be on the supplement and, therefore, even that measure of a relief is denied them.

We have a social problem which has not been improved by this budget. Another element which has not received much notice is the unemployment insurance charges. This plan was once considered an insurance scheme with the government helping out by making a substantial contribution. However, it is no longer anything of the sort. It is now a plain wage tax. The character of the plan has been altered entirely. Under the new budget effective January 1 this year there is a 33⅓ per cent increase in the rate of unemployment insurance deductions. The rate is up to $1.80 per $100 of insurable earnings.

I do not slough off the fact that there was an increase in unemployment insurance payments in the Conservative budget as well, but it was not as large as this one. This one has another factor attached to it which is particularly unsatisfactory—that is, the ceiling, the amount of pay against which unemployment insurance charges are calculated, has been raised from $159 to $174 per week.

What is the combined effect of the increase in the rate of tax and the increase in the amount of money to be taxed? The amount of money to be taxed has gone up 9 per cent. The amount of tax being levied has gone up 33⅓ per cent. I think there is something wrong with that. I do not think that is fair; that is not a square deal. That is a charge that the Canadian Council on Social Development calculated. It calculated $100 as this new cost-of-living charge we are placing against the salaries of those of the lower income groups. It seems to me that that is something that leaves much to be desired.

This budget is full of sleepers. It consists of 224 pages. I wish I could say that I have read them all with care, but I have not; I just leafed through them. However, I am sure there are more sleepers than the ones I have discovered.

Another sleeper has to do with the shift in the manufacturers' sales tax. The manufacturers' sales tax of 9 per cent is being shifted under the new regulations with respect to some categories of taxation. Certain taxes at the manufacturing level on certain marginal organizations have been imposed that formerly were not imposed. There has been a shift in the manufacturers' sales tax to these marginal people in the manufacturing business. The result of this is not entirely pleasant because it will hurt some rather defenceless people. In Manitoba, for example, we have what we call sheltered workshops. These sheltered workshops are places where retarded children, retarded adults or people with handicaps work. These places give a purpose in life to these people and enable them to make some kind of living. They produce a product that somebody can use, and that is a good thing. For many years in Manitoba people have patronized sheltered workshops because they have wanted to help out in this respect, provided they could do so without facing an economic disadvantage. Now I am told that the shift in the manufacturers' sales tax to some of these marginal industries, such as the one I stated, makes it highly probable that they will lose some business. Those people who have patronized them in the past may not patronize them in the future. The fact of the matter is that these sheltered workshops may be cut out of the economic cycle because of this change in their tax category.

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business has drawn this to the attention of the government, as has the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, and as has the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. They have all asked for a delay in this matter until these anomalies—which probably were not intended—are sorted out. The Canadian Consumers' Association was so stimulated by this that it awarded the Minister of Finance the raspberry of the month. I rather thought that they would have done better to have awarded him the raspberry of the year. However, it is there.

Senator Buckwold: That is reserved for others.

Senator Roblin: I wonder to whom my honourable friend is referring.

Senator Flynn: It is too late now.

Senator Roblin: I have an idea that my honourable friend will have to accept all the raspberries directed in his direction, because he is in power, he has asked for the responsibility, he has it, and I want to see that he discharges it properly. If that involves the swallowing of a few raspberries, I am not at all surprised.

However, to get back to this, I wish to discuss the small business development bond interest plan, because I think that that can be improved substantially. High interest costs are one of the most substantial negative factors in the small business sector of our economy today. High interest costs are an important reason for the serious increase in small business bankruptcies that we have noticed—or, at least, that I hope we have noticed—because many of these small tragedies go ignored in the shadow of Chrysler and Massey Ferguson. They attract a lot less attention and, therefore, a lot less help.

The small business sector's need for money focuses, I suggest, on the need for working capital, and that is not recognized in the bill. The bill provides that money will be provided for capital investment in the purchase of fixed assets, such as land, machinery and so forth. That has to be a good thing, but I think they are severely limiting the capacity of the act to be useful by making it impossible to secure working capital loans, when that really is the greatest area of need in a period of high interest rates and in a period of capital difficulties such as we are experiencing at the present. I would like to see both working capital and investment capital recognized as being eligible for small business bond interest treatment in this bill.

There is another factor which perhaps is even more important, and that is that the benefit of the small business bond interest relief measure is restricted to incorporated small businesses. Unincorporated small businesses are excluded. That really means that most small businesses are out in the cold. We have approximately 930,000 small businesses in this country, with 625,000 being unincorporated. So, no matter what is in the bill, only about one-third of the small business sector of the country can get inside the tent. The remaining two-thirds are left out in the cold.

I am the first one to appreciate the difficulties of defining "unincorporated" so that we could come to some reasonable parameters as to how far this act should go. I know there are problems with that, but I suggest that it is an area to which we should devote a great deal of our attention, because it seems to me that small businesses, on the whole, are the most fruitful source of new jobs in the country. Don't forget that: small businesses, on the whole, are the most fruitful source of new jobs in the country. That has been the case, statistically, for the past goodness-knows-how-long. It is a better source of jobs than is Chrysler, and a better source of jobs than is Massey Ferguson, but individually it seems that these people are too small to be noticed. I suggest that Bill C-54, on small business loans, misses a big target. I hope it gets back on to that target before long.

I have spoken so far about some of the micro-economic implications of the measure before us. I now want to spend a brief moment or two on the macro-economic factors that are associated with it. Of course, I first want to refer to the issue of inflation. After a careful perusal of the budget papers and after listening to all the speeches and observing the press reaction and opinion of commentators, I find that my own rather sad conclusions have been substantiated in that, in practical terms, the government has as good as given up on inflation. The figures speak for themselves. The inflation rate was forecast in the budget to be 10.2 per cent. The actual figure for the month of January is 12 per cent.

I think it is quite clear that the public has no confidence that the government intends to bring inflation down, except, perhaps, in the sweet by-and-by. I say that if one can believe the forecast figures for the sweet by-and-by. It might be this year, next year, sometime, never. The public is clearly anticipating continued high inflation rates in Canada, and will continue to do so until the administration gives them a clear, unmistakable signal that that is not the case. Indeed, why should the public not think that? They see federal government budgetary outlays up 15.2 per cent over last year, and that is rising faster than the rate of inflation. They see government spending rising faster than the rate of inflation. The public sees the government planning a current deficit of approximately $14 billion, almost one dollar in every four spent not covered by income the government will receive. The public knows that interest costs, to say nothing of retiring the debt, are estimated this year to be $10.4 billion. That is up an astonishing 22 per cent over the figure for last year. They know that the government's program calls for borrowing money, not just to finance their deficit, I am afraid, but to pay the interest on the money they have already borrowed.

If I can use a poetic phrase from my high school days which comes to mind, to pile Ossa on Pelion, one mountain on top of another, when does this process come to an end? The public can see no sign, in my opinion, that the process is winding down, because there are no substantial indications that they can look for some substantial improvement in this matter in the time that lies near at hand or closely ahead.

I want to say something about how the Minister of Finance appears to look at his problem. He describes his budget and his fiscal policy as being dedicated to a gradualist approach to these problems. "Gradualist" is the "in" word, I think, these days, in government finance—as if that were something to recommend it. He ties this into the monetary policy being followed by the Bank of Canada, and says that the bank is following the same balanced and moderate approach that is the basis of economic policy outlined in the budget. That is what the Minister of Finance says about himself and about the Governor of the Bank of Canada. They are gradualists.

Does the Minister of Finance ever read, however, the speeches of the Governor of the Bank of Canada? I ask that because they are enlightening. Governor Bouey made one on December 17 last year, at the meeting of the federal and provincial ministers of finance, and I am constrained to believe that the Minister of Finance, if he did not read the speech, must have heard it, because he was surely there. That speech, it struck me, was a confession of disappointment, not to put it in any stronger terms, on the part of the Governor of the Bank of Canada, in which he outlined the problems he had run into in dealing, in a gradualist manner, with policies that were intended to master inflation. It contained, also, an appeal—one of his many appeals—for more government fiscal and economic action to assist in the fight against inflation.

Of course, Governor Bouey defends his policy—you could not expect him to do anything else—but he does tell the story of his gradualist efforts since 1975 to bring inflation down. For five years we have had this "balanced and moderate approach" to the problems of inflation, and inflation, at the end of it, is higher than when it began. It is getting worse, not better.

Bringing down the rate of monetary growth, which is the main instrument used by the Bank of Canada, shows little or no beneficial effects, I put it to you, on the economic well-being of the nation, nor has it done anything to improve the trends of inflation. At 12 per cent, inflation stands as high as it ever did.

In that speech, which I thought reflected great credit on the Governor, he could only express his confidence that in time inflation would decline again. Well, I have to say that my confidence in that policy is somewhat shaken, and that time, ultimately, runs out on all of us, particularly with inflation in double digit figures.

Governor Bouey, however, was candid enough to conclude—in fact, to speculate—with regard to what would have happened if he had not been dedicated to quite so gradualist a policy, that more action, more promptly taken, might have been better. I think he is on to a good point there.

Governor Bouey went on to say that it might have been useful—that is his word; mine would have been "imperative"—to have his monetary policy reinforced by stronger anti-inflationary action in other areas of public policy. When you interpret that Bank of Canada language, it means that the Minister of Finance, and the government's fiscal and economic policy, ought to have been more supportive of his efforts against inflation.

Governor Bouey, as is proper, speaks with reserve, and guardedly, but his message came through with crystal clarity to me, and that is that gradualism is a flop, and that the government's policy has helped to make it so. The Bank of Canada has not only to contend with current market forces in its problems with the rate of exchange, but also with the long term consequences of government action, which I maintain has been wrong. I do not want to put words in Governor Bouey's mouth, but he seemed to me to be almost on the point of saying so. Perhaps, one of these days, he will.

The final witness I would like to call on in dealing with our current affairs is the Prime Minister. When Prime Minister Trudeau was campaigning for election just a year ago now, he did not really have much to say about his policy and platform. I did not hear much, for example, certainly in western Canada, concerning what he was going to do about the Constitution. He did, however, make five basic commitments, which constituted the economic program of the Liberal Party in the last election, and it is instructive now to examine what happened to those commitments.

I would like to quote some of the things that the Prime Minister said. First, he said:

> We will hold the line on government expenditures under the rate of the gross national product.

That is a pretty clear undertaking. We know that it has not been carried out. We know that the budget increase in the current year is 15.2 per cent, and that the rate of inflation and the rate of the GNP, in which inflation is a factor, is substantially below that. So promise No. 1 has not been kept, and is a promise which certainly is hardly credible now.

The second thing the Prime Minister said was:

> We will negotiate an increase of less than 14 cents in the price of a gallon of gas.

Now, I do not repeat that promise merely for the sake of comic relief, though that is probably what it is in today's circumstances, but to show you that as a political promise it has very little credibility now. Negotiations are nowhere. They have not begun on a serious basis in terms of the present stand-off. Everybody knows that the 14 cents a gallon is an impossible target to hit. It was impossible last year and is even more so now. Everybody knows also that the new gasoline taxes, regardless of negotiations with any province, will begin to bite—indeed, they have begun to bite.

I think Mr. Trudeau is determined to make John Crosbie look good, when he talks about 14 cents and 18 cents in terms of gas prices in this country. I think that the policy he spurned with such indignation a year ago will now turn out to be just as good and perhaps even a little better than the policy he has produced himself. In fact, so far the policy is mostly confrontation.

The next thing the Prime Minister said, which is point number three:

> This party will not simply stand by and let the recession come. We will fight and overcome it.

I do not know why he did not say, "And we will wrestle it to the ground," because that is what he usually says when referring to something that he has no intention of doing at all.

Where are we today? There are more unemployed people now in Canada than there were a year ago. There is certainly no credibility in this basic economic undertaking of the Prime Minister.

I now go on to point number four. The Prime Minister said that he would "head a national government that uses its strength to realize the aspirations and economic potential of each of our provinces . . . a national government that builds up rather than tears down . . . decades of opportunity rather than decades of doubt.

That is great rhetoric. I wish I could believe it. One year later, what do we have? We have the most bitter confrontation that I have seen in my lifetime between the provinces and the federal government, not only on the political level, but on the regional and economic level as well. Remember that the Prime Minister was the man who was to bind up the wounds, to make us one, to reconcile our differences, and yet we have this sad and sorry situation which causes the nations of the world to look at us and say, "What are these crazy Canadians up to? They cannot get along in the best country that God ever made."

Senator Haidasz: Thanks to the premiers.

Senator Roblin: I beg your pardon? Would you like to repeat that?

Senator Haidasz: Thanks to the premiers.

Senator Roblin: Thanks to the premiers! I see. Well, I am glad to get your opinion on the subject. It is worth what I paid for it, too.

The final point I would like to mention that the Prime Minister referred to in his statement of economic policy for the nation is that he would "enhance the security of every individual by helping those who most need assistance."

Compare that piece of fine talk with the actual facts respecting minimum wage earners that we find in this budget that is now before us, and which I have placed before this house. It is fine talk indeed, when we have a regressive budget that bears as it does on the scanty resources of low income Canadians, as illustrated by the Canadian Council of Social Affairs. Compare these sentiments with the unemployment we see around us and the stagnation that is obvious in some sectors of our economy.

Let us bear in mind, when we come to the budget and the economic policies and promises of the Liberal Party, that these are the five points made by our Prime Minister—because he is my Prime Minister as well as yours, do not forget—when he was running as a politician in the election. I think I can safely say that none of them has been kept with any faith or credibility.

That is the situation: promises not kept, but forgotten, as the political baggage of an election campaign, and nothing more than that. I feel that the October budget, apart from the energy matter, which is the subject of another bill and another debate, is one of "stand pat", is regressive, and dooms us to serious inflation in the foreseeable future.

With some regret I must pass on to you the common verdict, I think, across this country, that it creates more problems than it solves, and it fails to meet both the short-run and the long-run interests of the Canadian nation.

• (1530)

Honourable senators, having expressed my views on this piece of legislation in the manner in which I have, you would not expect me to vote for Bill C-54, because of its serious defects and disadvantages in connection with the economic welfare and health of our people. Although there is little possibility, I suggest, of any of the ideas presented from this side of the house being incorporated in this piece of legislation, I hope that in times to come we may find ourselves able to achieve a more equitable meeting of minds than we have to date.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I should like to draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that if the Honourable Senator McIlraith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I listened with great attention to the honourable senator who has just concluded his remarks. I wondered at times whether they were confined to the bill before us, but, in any event, I was very interested in them. He debated matters other than those contained in the bill, and although I did not draw that fact to his attention at the time I do not want him to think for one moment that that will be taken as a precedent by me. I reserve the right on other similar occasions, if they arise, to seek to restrict him to those matters that are relevant to the debate.

Senator Flynn: You try it.

Senator McIlraith: I note that he observed that the bill does cover items of income tax legislation having their origin in speeches of several former ministers of finance. Indeed, he might have added one going back to 1978. So we have the extraordinary situation that the bill now before us deals with items dating back to 1978, the December 11, 1979 budget of Mr. Crosbie, the budget resolutions of April 21, 1980, and the October budget of the present Minister of Finance, Mr. MacEachen.

It is fortunate, indeed, that we are at long last getting these legislative items before the appropriate committee and having them disposed of. That is an advantageous and desirable thing in the interests of all taxpayers and the economy of the country.

I noted particularly Senator Roblin's remarks about small business, I share his view as to the importance of those firms, as he correctly set out, in the economy of the country. There is one point I should like to draw to the honourable senator's attention. It seems to me that his seeking to extend the provisions respecting small business would be beyond the jurisdiction of the Senate. I hope that we shall not have to fight that battle, but he could, as the complex clause dealing with small business comes before the committee, present his point of view to see whether there are any changes within our legislative jurisdiction that can be brought about. The matter was discussed in committee on Tuesday and will be discussed again.

The honourable senator said he expressed his views on this piece of legislation, just as I did. While I found his views tremendously interesting, I am not sure that I should be asked to agree that they were all wholly related to this legislation.

Honourable senators, in concluding my remarks, I ask you to give this bill your favourable consideration.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think my honourable friend has raised a point of order to which I would like to respond.

Senator McIlraith: I did not. I was very careful to refrain from doing so.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps I will raise the point of order. It seems to me the point is being made that it was inappropriate to refer to any matter that was not put forward within the 224 pages of this bill. I do not agree with that, for the reason that it provides the basis for a review of the budgetary and economic policies of the government. The source of the bill is the budget. It was delivered in the other place by the Minister of Finance. This is one of the matters arising out of that budgetary debate. When my honourable friend introduced the bill the other day he began to get into that whole area of budgetary policy which I think it was his right to do. I simply say that if the point of order was on my honourable friend's mind, I do not think it was justified.

Senator McIlraith: In any event, I did not raise it today. I made it clear that I did not propose to. I will raise it on another occasion.

Senator Flynn: Choose a better occasion.

Senator Roblin: I will wait for it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Roblin: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator McIlraith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN
DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold, for Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government), seconded by Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), moved:

THAT, WHEREAS in the past certain amendments to the Constitution of Canada have been made by the Parliament of the United Kingdom at the request and with the consent of Canada;

AND WHEREAS it is in accord with the status of Canada as an independent state that Canadians be able to amend their Constitution in Canada in all respects;

AND WHEREAS it is also desirable to provide in the Constitution of Canada for the recognition of certain fundamental rights and freedoms and to make other amendments to that Constitution;

A respectful address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

CONSIDÉRANT:

Que le Parlement du Royaume-Uni a modifié à plusieurs reprises la Constitution du Canada à la demande et avec le consentement de celui-ci;

que, de par le statut d'État indépendant du Canada, il est légitime que les Canadiens aient tout pouvoir pour modifier leur Constitution au Canada;

qu'il est souhaitable d'inscrire dans la Constitution du Canada la reconnaissance de certains droits et libertés fondamentaux et d'y apporter d'autres modifications, il est proposé que soit présentée respectueusement à Sa Majesté la Reine l'adresse dont la teneur suit:

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada in Parliament assembled, respectfully approach Your Majesty, requesting that you may graciously be pleased to cause to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom a measure containing the recitals and clauses hereinafter set forth:

A Sa Très Excellente Majesté la Reine,

Très Gracieuse Souveraine:

Nous, membres du Sénat du Canada réunis en Parlement, fidèles sujets de Votre Majesté, demandons respectueusement à Votre Très Gracieuse Majesté de bien vouloir faire déposer devant le Parlement du Royaume-Uni un projet de loi ainsi conçu:

ANNEXE A—SCHEDULE A

An Act to give effect to a request by the Senate and House of Commons of Canada

Whereas Canada has requested and consented to the enactment of an Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom to give effect to the provisions hereinafter set forth and the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled have submitted an address to Her Majesty requesting that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a Bill to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom for that purpose.

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

Loi donnant suite à une demande du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes du Canada

Sa Très Excellente Majesté la Reine, considérant :

qu'à la demande et avec le consentement du Canada, le Parlement du Royaume-Uni est invité à adopter une loi visant à donner effet aux dispositions énoncées ci-après et que le Sénat et la Chambre des communes du Canada réunis en Parlement ont présenté une adresse demandant à Sa Très Gracieuse Majesté de bien vouloir faire déposer devant le Parlement du Royaume-Uni un projet de loi à cette fin,

sur l'avis et du consentement des Lords spirituels et temporels et des Communes réunis en Parlement, et par l'autorité de celui-ci, édicte :

Constitution Act, 1981 enacted

1. The Constitution Act, 1981 set out in Schedule B to this Act is hereby enacted for and shall have the force of law in Canada and shall come into force as provided in that Act.

Adoption de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1981

1. La Loi constitutionnelle de 1981, énoncée à l'annexe B, est édictée pour le Canada et y a force de loi. Elle entre en vigueur conformément à ses dispositions.

Termination of power to legislate for Canada

2. No Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the Constitution Act, 1981 comes into force shall extend to Canada as part of its law.

2. Les lois adoptées par le Parlement du Royaume-Uni après l'entrée en vigueur de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1981 ne font pas partie du droit du Canada.

Cessation du pouvoir de légiférer pour le Canada

French version

3. So far as it is not contained in Schedule B, the French version of this Act is set out in Schedule A to this Act and has the same authority in Canada as the English version thereof.

3. La partie de la version française de la présente loi qui figure à l'annexe A a force de loi au Canada au même titre que la version anglaise correspondante.

(d) to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law in a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal;

(e) not to be denied reasonable bail without just cause;

(f) except in the case of an offence under military law tried before a military tribunal, to the benefit of trial by jury where the maximum punishment for the offence is imprisonment for five years or a more severe punishment;

(g) not to be found guilty on account of any act or omission unless, at the time of the act or omission, it constituted an offence under Canadian or international law or was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations;

(h) if finally acquitted of the offence, not to be tried for it again and, if finally found guilty and punished for the offence, not to be tried or punished for it again; and

(i) if found guilty of the offence and if the punishment for the offence has been varied between the time of commission and the time of sentencing, to the benefit of the lesser punishment.

Affaires criminelles et pénales

11. Tout inculpé a le droit :

a) d'être informé sans délai anormal de l'infraction précise qu'on lui reproche;

b) d'être jugé dans un délai raisonnable;

c) de ne pas être contraint de témoigner contre lui-même dans toute poursuite intentée contre lui pour l'infraction qu'on lui reproche;

d) d'être présumé innocent tant qu'il n'est pas déclaré coupable, conformément à la loi, par un tribunal indépendant et impartial à l'issue d'un procès public et équitable;

e) de ne pas être privé sans juste cause d'une mise en liberté assortie d'un cautionnement raisonnable;

f) sauf s'il s'agit d'une infraction relevant de la justice militaire, de bénéficier d'un procès avec jury lorsque la peine maximale prévue pour l'infraction dont il est accusé est un emprisonnement de cinq ans ou une peine plus grave;

g) de ne pas être déclaré coupable en raison d'une action ou d'une omission qui, au moment où elle est survenue, ne constituait pas une infraction d'après le droit interne du Canada ou le droit international et n'avait pas de caractère criminel d'après les principes généraux de droit reconnus par l'ensemble des nations;

h) d'une part de ne pas être jugé de nouveau pour une infraction dont il a été définitivement acquitté, d'autre part de ne pas être jugé ni puni de nouveau pour une infraction dont il a été définitivement trouvé coupable et puni;

i) de bénéficier de la peine la moins sévère, lorsque la peine qui sanctionne l'infraction dont il est déclaré coupable est modifiée entre le moment de la perpétration de l'infraction et celui de la sentence.

Treatment or punishment

12. Everyone has the right not to be subjected to any cruel and unusual treatment or punishment.

Cruauté

12. Chacun a droit à la protection contre tous traitements ou peines cruels et inusités.

Equality Rights

Droits à l'égalité

Equality before and under law and equal protection and benefit of law

15. (1) Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

Égalité devant la loi, égalité de bénéfice et protection égale de la loi

15. (1) La loi ne fait acception de personne et s'applique également à tous, et tous ont droit à la même protection et au même bénéfice de la loi, indépendamment de toute discrimination, notamment des discriminations fondées sur la race, l'origine nationale ou ethnique, la couleur, la religion, le sexe, l'âge ou les déficiences mentales ou physiques.

Affirmative action programs

(2) Subsection (1) does not preclude any law, program or activity that has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups including those that are disadvantaged because of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

Programmes de promotion sociale

Continuation of existing constitutional provisions

21. Nothing in sections 16 to 20 abrogates or derogates from any right, privilege or obligation with respect to the English and French languages, or either of them, that exists or is continued by virtue of any other provision of the Constitution of Canada.

Maintien en vigueur de certaines dispositions

21. Les articles 16 à 20 n'ont pas pour effet, en ce qui a trait à la langue française ou anglaise ou à ces deux langues, de porter atteinte aux droits, privilèges ou obligations qui existent ou sont maintenus aux termes d'une autre disposition de la Constitution du Canada.

Rights and privileges preserved

22. Nothing in sections 16 to 20 abrogates or derogates from any legal or customary right or privilege acquired or enjoyed either before or after the coming into force of this Charter with respect to any language that is not English or French.

Droits préservés

22. Les articles 16 à 20 n'ont pas pour effet de porter atteinte aux droits et privilèges, antérieurs ou postérieurs à l'entrée en vigueur de la présente charte et découlant de la loi ou de la coutume, des langues autres que le français ou l'anglais.

Minority Language Educational Rights

Droits à l'instruction dans la langue de la minorité

Language of instruction

23. (1) Citizens of Canada

(a) whose first language learned and still understood is that of the English or French linguistic minority population of the province in which they reside, or have the right to have their children receive primary and secondary school instruction in that language in that province.

Langue d'instruction

23. (1) Les citoyens canadiens :

a) dont la première langue apprise et encore comprise est celle de la minorité francophone ou anglophone de la province où ils résident,

b) qui ont reçu leur instruction, au niveau primaire, en français ou en anglais au Canada et qui résident dans une province où la langue dans laquelle ils ont reçu cette instruction est celle de la minorité francophone ou anglophone de la province, ont, dans l'un ou l'autre cas, le droit d'y faire instruire leurs enfants, aux niveaux primaire et secondaire, dans cette langue.

Continuity of language instruction

(2) Citizens of Canada of whom any child has received or is receiving primary or secondary school instruction in English or French in Canada, have the right to have all their children receive primary and secondary school instruction in the same language.

Continuité d'emploi de la langue d'instruction

(2) Les citoyens canadiens dont un enfant a reçu ou reçoit son instruction, au niveau primaire ou secondaire, en français ou en anglais au Canada ont le droit de faire instruire tous leurs enfants, aux niveaux primaire et secondaire, dans la langue de cette instruction.

Application where numbers warrant

(3) The right of citizens of Canada under subsections (1) and (2) to have their children receive primary and secondary school instruction in the language of the English or French linguistic minority population of a province

(a) applies wherever in the province the number of children of citizens who have such a right is sufficient to warrant the provision to them out of public funds of minority language instruction; and

Justification par le nombre

(3) Le droit reconnu aux citoyens canadiens par les paragraphes (1) et (2) de faire instruire leurs enfants, aux niveaux primaire et secondaire, dans la langue de la minorité francophone ou anglophone d'une province :

a) s'exerce partout dans la province où le nombre des enfants des citoyens qui ont ce droit est suffisant pour justifier à leur endroit la prestation, sur les fonds publics, de l'instruction dans la langue de la minorité;

(b) includes, where the number of those children so warrants, the right to have them receive that instruction in minority language educational facilities provided out of public funds.

b) comprend, lorsque le nombre de ces enfants le justifie, le droit de les faire instruire dans des établissements d'enseignement de la minorité linguistique financés sur les fonds publics.

Enforcement

Recours

Enforcement of guaranteed rights and freedoms

24. (1) Anyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

24. (1) Toute personne, victime de violation ou de négation des droits et libertés qui lui sont garantis par la présente charte, peut s'adresser à un tribunal compétent pour obtenir la réparation que le tribunal estime convenable et juste eu égard aux circonstances.

Recours en cas d'atteinte aux droits et libertés

Exclusion of evidence bringing administration of justice into disrepute

(2) Where, in proceedings under subsection (1), a court concludes that evidence was obtained in a manner that infringed or denied any rights or freedoms guaranteed by this Charter, the evidence shall be excluded if it is established that, having regard to all the circumstances, the admission of it in the proceedings would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

(2) Lorsque, dans une instance visée au paragraphe (1), le tribunal a conclu que des éléments de preuve ont été obtenus dans des conditions qui portent atteinte aux droits ou libertés garantis par la présente charte, ces éléments de preuve sont écartés s'il est établi, eu égard aux circonstances, que leur utilisation est susceptible de déconsidérer l'administration de la justice.

Commitment respecting public services

(2) Parliament and the government of Canada are committed to the principle of making equalization payments to ensure that provincial governments have sufficient revenues to provide reasonably comparable levels of public services at reasonably comparable levels of taxation.

Engagement relatif aux services publics

PART IV

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCES

PARTIE IV

CONFÉRENCES CONSTITUTIONNELLES

Constitutional conferences

35. (1) Until Part VI comes into force, a constitutional conference composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces shall be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada at least once in every year.

Conférences constitutionnelles

35. (1) Avant l'entrée en vigueur de la partie VI, le premier ministre du Canada convoque au moins une fois par an une conférence constitutionnelle réunissant les premiers ministres provinciaux et lui-même.

Participation of aboriginal peoples

(2) A conference convened under subsection (1) shall have included in its agenda an item respecting constitutional matters that directly affect the aboriginal peoples of Canada, including the identification and definition of the rights of those peoples to be included in the Constitution of Canada, and the Prime Minister of Canada shall invite representatives of those peoples to participate in the discussions on that item.

Participation des peuples autochtones

Participation of territories

(3) The Prime Minister of Canada shall invite elected representatives of the governments of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories to participate in the discussions on any item on the agenda of a conference convened under subsection (1) that, in the opinion of the Prime Minister, directly affects the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

Participation des territoires

PART V

INTERIM AMENDMENT PROCEDURE AND RULES FOR ITS REPLACEMENT

Interim procedure for amending Constitution of Canada

36. Until Part VI comes into force, an amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and by the legislative assembly or government of each province.

Amendment of provisions relating to some but not all provinces

37. Until Part VI comes into force, an amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to any provision that applies to one or more, but not all, provinces may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and by the legislative assembly or government of each province to which the amendment applies.

Amendments respecting certain language rights

38. (1) Notwithstanding section 40, an amendment to the Constitution of Canada

(a) adding a province as a province named in subsection 16(2), 17(2), 18(2), 19(2) or 20(2), or

(b) otherwise providing for any or all of the rights guaranteed or obligations imposed by any of those subsections to have application in a province to the extent and under the conditions stated in the amendment, may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and the legislative assembly of the province to which the amendment applies.

Initiation of amendment procedure

(2) The procedure for amendment prescribed by subsection (1) may be initiated only by the legislative assembly of the province to which the amendment applies.

Initiation of amendment procedures

39. (1) The procedures for amendment prescribed by sections 36 and 37 may be initiated either by the Senate or House of Commons or by the legislative assembly or government of a province.

PARTIE V

PROCÉDURE PROVISOIRE DE MODIFICATION ET RÈGLES DE REMPLACEMENT

Procédure provisoire de modification

Modification à l'égard de certaines provinces

37. Avant l'entrée en vigueur de la partie VI, les dispositions de la Constitution du Canada applicables à certaines provinces seulement peuvent être modifiées par proclamation du gouverneur général sous le grand sceau du Canada, autorisée par des résolutions du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes et par l'assemblée législative ou le gouvernement de chaque province à laquelle la modification s'applique.

Modification concernant certains droits linguistiques

38. (1) Par dérogation à l'article 40, toute modification de la Constitution du Canada :

a) soit portant insertion du nom d'une province aux paragraphes 16(2), 17(2), 18(2), 19(2) ou 20(2),

b) soit prévoyant l'application à une province, aux conditions précisées dans la modification, de tout ou partie des droits ou obligations visés à ces paragraphes, peut être prise par proclamation du gouverneur général sous le grand sceau du Canada, autorisée par des résolutions du Sénat, de la Chambre des communes et de l'assemblée législative de la province concernée.

Initiative de la procédure

(2) L'initiative de la procédure de modification visée au paragraphe (1) appartient à l'assemblée législative de la province concernée.

Initiative des procédures

39. (1) L'initiative des procédures de modification visées aux articles 36 et 37 appartient au Sénat, à la Chambre des communes, à l'assemblée législative d'une province ou au gouvernement de celle-ci.

Revocation of authorization

(2) A resolution made or other authorization given for the purposes of this Part may be revoked at any time before the issue of a proclamation authorized by it.

Possibilité de révocation

(2) La résolution adoptée ou l'autorisation donnée dans le cadre de la présente partie peut être révoquée à tout moment avant la date de la proclamation qu'elle autorise.

Limitation on use of interim amendment procedure

40. Sections 36 and 37 do not apply to an amendment to the Constitution of Canada where there is another provision in the Constitution for making the amendment, but the procedure prescribed by section 36 shall be used to amend the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and any provision for amending the Constitution, including this section.

Restriction du recours à la procédure provisoire

40. Les articles 36 et 37 ne s'appliquent pas aux cas de modification constitutionnelle pour lesquels une procédure différente est prévue par une autre disposition de la Constitution du Canada. La procédure visée à l'article 36 s'impose toutefois pour modifier la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, ainsi que les dispositions relatives à la modification de la Constitution, y compris le présent article.

Coming into force of Part VI

41. Part VI shall come into force

(a) with or without amendment, on such day as may be fixed by proclamation issued pursuant to the procedure prescribed by section 36, or

(b) on the day that is two years after the day this Act, except Part VI, comes into force, whichever is the earlier day but, if a referendum is required to be held under subsection 42(3), Part VI shall come into force as provided in section 43.

Entrée en vigueur de la partie VI

41. La partie VI entre en vigueur à la première des dates suivantes :

a) avec ou sans modification, à la date fixée par proclamation prise conformément à la procédure visée à l'article 36;

b) deux ans après l'entrée en vigueur, exception faite de la partie VI, de la présente loi.

Il demeure entendu que, si la tenue d'un référendum s'impose conformément au paragraphe 42(3), la partie VI entre en vigueur conformément à l'article 43.

Provincial alternative procedure

42. (1) The legislative assemblies of seven or more provinces that have, according to the then latest general census, combined populations of at least eighty per cent of the population of all the provinces may make a single proposal to substitute for paragraph 45(1)(b) such alternative as they consider appropriate.

Proposition de remplacement

42. (1) Les assemblées législatives d'au moins sept provinces dont la population confondue représente, selon le recensement général le plus récent à l'époque, au moins quatre-vingts pour cent de la population de toutes les provinces peuvent présenter une proposition commune en vue de remplacer la procédure prévue à l'alinéa 45(1)b).

Procedure for perfecting alternative

(2) One copy of an alternative proposed under subsection (1) may be deposited with the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada by each proposing province within two years after this Act, except Part VI, comes into force but, prior to the expiration of that period, any province that has deposited a copy may withdraw that copy.

Possibilité de mise au point

Referendum

(3) Where copies of an alternative have been deposited as provided by subsection (2) and, on the day that is two years after this Act, except Part VI, comes into force, at least seven copies remain deposited by provinces that have, according to the then latest

general census, combined populations of at least eighty per cent of the population of all the provinces, the government of Canada shall cause a referendum to be held within two years after that day to determine whether

(a) paragraph 45(1)(b) or any alternative thereto approved by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and deposited with the Chief Electoral Officer at least ninety days prior to the day on which the referendum is held, or

(b) the alternative proposed by the provinces,

fait tenir, dans les deux années suivant l'échéance des deux ans, un référendum pour déterminer laquelle des procédures suivantes sera adoptée :

a) celle qui est prévue à l'alinéa 45(1)b) ou l'éventuelle procédure de remplacement adoptée par des résolutions du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes et dont le texte est déposé auprès du directeur général des élections au moins quatre-vingt-dix jours avant la date du référendum;

b) celle qui fait l'objet de la proposition des provinces.

Coming into force of Part VI where referendum held

43. Where a referendum is held under subsection 42(3), a proclamation under the Great Seal of Canada shall be issued within six months after the date of the referendum bringing Part VI into force with such modifications, if any, as are necessary to incorporate the proposal approved by a majority of the persons voting at the referendum and with such other changes as are reasonably consequential on the incorporation of that proposal.

Entrée en vigueur de la partie VI après référendum

43. Dans les six mois suivant la date du référendum visé au paragraphe 42(3), une proclamation sous le grand sceau du Canada est prise en vue de faire entrer en vigueur la partie VI, éventuellement modifiée dans la mesure nécessaire pour incorporer la proposition approuvée par la majorité des votants et pour intégrer les autres aménagements justifiés qui en découlent.

Duty of Commission

(3) A Referendum Rules Commission shall cause rules for the holding of a referendum under subsection 42(3) approved by a majority of the Commission to be laid before Parliament within sixty days after the Commission is established or, if Parliament is not then sitting, on any of the first ten days next thereafter that Parliament is sitting.

Mandat de la commission

Rules for referendum

(4) Subject to subsection (1) and taking into consideration any rules approved by a Referendum Rules Commission in accordance with subsection (3), Parliament may enact laws respecting the rules applicable to the holding of a referendum under subsection 42(3).

Réglementation du référendum

(4) Sous réserve du paragraphe (1) et compte tenu des règles déposées conformément au paragraphe (3), le Parlement peut légiférer pour réglementer la tenue du référendum visé au paragraphe 42(3).

Proclamation

(5) If Parliament does not enact laws under subsection (4) respecting the rules applicable to the holding of a referendum within sixty days after receipt of a recommendation from a Referendum Rules Commission, the rules recommended by the Commission shall forthwith be brought into force by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada.

Proclamation

(5) Faute par le Parlement d'avoir légiféré, conformément au paragraphe (4), dans le délai de soixante jours suivant le dépôt des règles visées au paragraphe (3), celles-ci sont mises immédiatement en vigueur par proclamation du gouverneur général sous le grand sceau du Canada.

Computation of period

(6) Any period when Parliament is prorogued or dissolved shall not be counted in computing the sixty day period referred to in subsection (5).

Computation du délai

(6) Dans la computation du délai visé au paragraphe (5), ne sont pas comptés les jours pendant lesquels le Parlement est prorogé ou dissous.

Rules to have force of law

(7) Subject to subsection (1), rules made under this section have the force of law and prevail over other laws made under the Constitution of Canada to the extent of any inconsistency.

Valeur de force de loi des règles

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

PARTIE VII

MODIFICATION DE LA LOI CONSTITUTIONNELLE DE 1867

Amendment to Constitution Act, 1867

56. (1) The Constitution Act, 1867 (formerly named the British North America Act, 1867) is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 92 thereof, the following heading and section:

Modification de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867

56. (1) La Loi constitutionnelle de 1867 (antérieurement désignée sous le titre : Acte de l'Amérique du Nord britannique, 1867) est modifiée par l'insertion, après l'article 92, de la rubrique et de l'article suivants :

"Non-Renewable Natural Resources, Forestry Resources and Electrical Energy

«Ressources naturelles non renouvelables, ressources forestières et énergie électrique

Laws respecting non-renewable natural resources, forestry resources and electrical energy

92A. (1) In each province, the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to

(a) exploration for non-renewable natural resources in the province;

(b) development, conservation and management of non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province, including laws in relation to the rate of primary production therefrom; and

(c) development, conservation and management of sites and facilities in the province for the generation and production of electrical energy.

Compétence provinciale

92A. (1) La législature de chaque province a compétence exclusive pour légiférer dans les domaines suivants :

a) prospection des ressources naturelles non renouvelables de la province;

b) exploitation, conservation et gestion des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières de la province, y compris leur rythme de production primaire;

c) aménagement, conservation et gestion des emplacements et des installations de la province destinés à la production d'énergie électrique.

Export from provinces of resources

(2) In each province, the legislature may make laws in relation to the export from the province to another part of Canada of the primary production from non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province and the production from facilities in the province for the generation of electrical energy, but such laws may not authorize or provide for discrimination in prices or in supplies exported to another part of Canada.

Exportation hors des provinces

(2) La législature de chaque province a compétence pour légiférer en ce qui concerne l'exportation, hors de la province, à destination d'une autre partie du Canada, de la production primaire tirée des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières de la province, ainsi que de la production d'énergie électrique de la province, sous réserve de ne pas adopter de lois autorisant ou prévoyant des disparités de prix ou des disparités dans les exportations destinées à une autre partie du Canada.

Authority of Parliament

(3) Nothing in subsection (2) derogates from the authority of Parliament to enact laws in relation to the matters referred to

Pouvoir du Parlement

(3) Le paragraphe (2) ne porte pas atteinte au pouvoir du Parlement de légiférer dans les domaines visés à ce paragra-

in that subsection and, where such a law of Parliament and a law of a province conflict, the law of Parliament prevails to the extent of the conflict.

Taxation of resources

(4) In each province, the legislature may make laws in relation to the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation in respect of

(a) non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province and the primary production therefrom, and

(b) sites and facilities in the province for the generation of electrical energy and the production therefrom, whether or not such production is exported in whole or in part from the province, but such laws may not authorize or provide for taxation that differentiates between production exported to another part of Canada and production not exported from the province.

"Primary production"

(5) The expression "primary production" has the meaning assigned by the Sixth Schedule.

Existing powers or rights

(6) Nothing in subsections (1) to (5) derogates from any powers or rights that a legislature or government of a province had immediately before the coming into force of this section."

Idem

57. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following Schedule:

"THE SIXTH SCHEDULE

Primary Production from Non-Renewable Natural Resources and Forestry Resources

1. For the purposes of section 92A of this Act,

(a) production from a non-renewable natural resource is primary production therefrom if

phe, les dispositions d'une loi du Parlement adoptée dans ces domaines l'emportant sur les dispositions incompatibles d'une loi provinciale.

Taxation des ressources

(4) La législature de chaque province a compétence pour prélever des sommes d'argent par tout mode ou système de taxation :

a) des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières de la province, ainsi que de la production primaire qui en est tirée;

b) des emplacements et des installations de la province destinés à la production d'énergie électrique, ainsi que cette production même.

Cette compétence peut s'exercer indépendamment du fait que la production en cause soit ou non, en totalité ou en partie, exportée hors de la province, mais les lois adoptées dans ces domaines ne peuvent autoriser ou prévoir une taxation qui établisse une distinction entre la production exportée à destination d'une autre partie du Canada et la production non exportée hors de la province.

«Production primaire»

(5) L'expression «production primaire» a le sens qui lui est donné dans la sixième annexe.

Pouvoirs ou droits existants

Idem

57. La présente loi est en outre modifiée par l'adjonction de l'annexe suivante :

«SIXIÈME ANNEXE

Production primaire tirée des ressources naturelles non renouvelables et des ressources forestières

1. Pour l'application de l'article 92A :

a) on entend par production primaire tirée d'une ressource naturelle non renouvelable :

(i) it is in the form in which it exists upon its recovery or severance from its natural state, or

(ii) it is a product resulting from processing or refining the resource, and is not a manufactured product or a product resulting from refining crude oil, refining upgraded heavy crude oil, refining gases or liquids derived from coal or refining a synthetic equivalent of crude oil; and

(b) production from a forestry resource is primary production therefrom if it consists of sawlogs, poles, lumber, wood chips, sawdust or any other primary wood product, or wood pulp, and is not a product manufactured from wood."

(i) soit le produit qui se présente sous la même forme que lors de son extraction du milieu naturel,

b) on entend par production primaire tirée d'une ressource forestière la production constituée de billots, de poteaux, de bois d'œuvre, de copeaux, de sciure ou d'autre produit primaire du bois, ou de pâte de bois, à l'exception d'un produit manufacturé en bois.»

A French version of the portions of the Constitution of Canada referred to in Schedule I shall be prepared by the Minister of Justice of Canada as expeditiously as possible and, when any portion thereof sufficient to warrant action being taken has been so prepared, it shall be put forward for enactment by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada pursuant to the procedure then applicable to an amendment of the same provisions of the Constitution of Canada.

Version française de certains textes constitutionnels

60. Le ministre de la Justice du Canada est chargé de rédiger, dans les meilleurs délais, la version française des parties de la Constitution du Canada qui figurent à l'annexe I; toute partie suffisamment importante est, dès qu'elle est prête, déposée pour adoption par proclamation du gouverneur général sous le grand sceau du Canada, conformément à la procédure applicable à l'époque à la modification des dispositions constitutionnelles qu'elle contient.

English and French versions of certain constitutional texts

61. Where any portion of the Constitution of Canada has been or is enacted in English and French or where a French version of any portion of the Constitution is enacted pursuant to section 60, the English and French versions of that portion of the Constitution are equally authoritative.

Versions française et anglaise de certains textes constitutionnels

61. Les versions française et anglaise des parties de la Constitution du Canada adoptées dans ces deux langues ont également force de loi. En outre, ont également force de loi, dès l'adoption, dans le cadre de l'article 60, d'une partie de la version française de la Constitution, cette partie et la version anglaise correspondante.

English and French versions of this Act

62. The English and French versions of this Act are equally authoritative.

Versions française et anglaise de la présente loi

62. Les versions française et anglaise de la présente loi ont également force de loi.

Commencement

63. Subject to section 64, this Act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada.

Entrée en vigueur

63. Sous réserve de l'article 64, la présente loi entre en vigueur au jour fixé par proclamation du gouverneur général sous le grand sceau du Canada.

Exception

64. Part VI shall come into force as provided in Part V.

Exception

64. La partie VI entre en vigueur dans les conditions prévues à la partie V.

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Austin: —I am presuming that Senator Perrault is yielding to me.

The government has asked me to begin this final stage of the debate in the Senate on the proposed Address to Her Majesty the Queen to patriate the Canadian Constitution with an amending formula, and to entrench in the Canadian Constitution a Charter of Rights.

I feel greatly honoured to lead off, and I also feel deeply the responsibility for marshalling in a clear and cogent way the desirability and, even more, the necessity of taking this critical step forward at one of the most decisive moments in Canadian political life.

I count it among the rare privileges in my lifetime, and I am sure it will remain such, that I was honoured by this chamber to be appointed a member of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada. I marvelled at the ignorance I had about Canada as I listened to witnesses from every walk of life and every community in our country. They came forward and expressed to us, on the first part, their disappointments with the treatment they had received at the hands of Canadian society generally, but even more important, on the second part, their great optimism in Canada and belief that our democratic society would concern itself with their needs and would satisfy those needs in a fair and equitable way.

The joint committee heard the pleas of such people as the Japanese Canadians, originally inhabitants of my own province of British Columbia. They recounted to us what took place to their community in the Second World War. It was not a proud moment, honourable senators, in the life of my province or, indeed, for Canada.

We heard from the Ukrainian community, the Mennonite community, the black community, the Jewish community, the French-speaking and English-speaking communities in the province of Quebec, the French-speaking communities in other parts of Canada, and many others. I regret that I cannot mention them all. They made a profound impact on the understanding of the members of the committee with regard to the nature of this country and the need to free the blockages in our political and constitutional processes which have held back the evolution of a more just society in Canada.

I would like to take a moment to pay tribute to the work of some of the members of this chamber, those senators who served either as permanent members or in a part-time capacity on the joint committee. The work of the Senate was certainly equal in every way to the work of the members of the other place. I felt, in particular, that the permanent members on both sides of this house, who were able to give continuity to their efforts, discharged their duties with great effect. I would like to extend a particular acknowledgment to Senator Roblin and Senator Tremblay for a very vigorous examination of the resolution as it lay before the joint committee and a vigorous defence of their own positions with respect to that resolution.

Last Tuesday in the other place, when they began their debate on the joint resolution, the word "historical" was often used. I share the conviction that in the whole history of the Senate we have not had imposed upon us more responsibility than we face now. We are being asked to weigh the state of the Canadian nation and to make choices, once and for all, between themes that have existed since the first federal Parliament met and members began to argue the political and constitutional nature of the nation that they had helped form. Canadians have argued the nature of Canada now for more than 100 years. Was the nation, as reflected through its national Parliament, to be paramount, or was the nation to be, in essence, a league of provinces? That was the choice which was argued then. That is the choice which has been argued since. That is the choice which this Parliament is being asked to make once and for all. It is an historic choice which faces us, and it will define our nation.

The joint resolution puts before us questions which deal with the essence of Canada. First, shall Canadians now free themselves from the last colonial appendage which remains extant; namely, the inability of the Canadian constitutional process to amend the Constitution of Canada without recourse to the British Parliament? Shall that recourse be severed at last? Second, shall Canadians, in freeing themselves from the British Parliament, provide themselves with an amending formula of the kind which will allow future constitutional changes to be made by the Queen in this Parliament supported by a requisite majority of the provinces or, failing that requisite majority, by the people of Canada directly? Can a fair balance be found between the flexibility required to ensure that the nation has at all times a Constitution which reflects the people of Canada and the necessary degree of stability to ensure that changes cannot be made unless they truly are fair and equitable to the regions and minorities of this country? Third, shall Canadians provide themselves, through the action of this Parliament, with a Charter of Rights which will serve to protect and foster our individual liberties, give hope to many Canadians who are labouring under a disadvantage in our society, and guarantee that, regardless of anyone's place in Canadian society, they are equal before the law and under the law?

Are these goals important to Canadians at this time? I think they are. Do they deserve the prominence in debate in the Parliament of Canada, in the legislatures of the provinces and in other levels of our community which they have received? I am convinced they do.

There are those who say that none of this is necessary; it is a tempest stirred up without reason; it is even an event taking place through the wilful act of one man.

Senator Flynn: Yes, I agree with that.

Senator Austin: I must deal with these assertions. This is a decisive moment in Canadian history, simply because in one major way the bargain of 1867 was not successfully carried forward in the following years. The bargain was to create on this northern half of the North American continent, in this country called Canada, one nation out of its two major peoples, whom we have come to call Canada's founding peoples. The French majority in Quebec came together with the English majority of Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia to create a nation in which there would be tolerance of one another, acceptance of one another's language and culture; a nation based on turning the diversities into complementarity, not uniformity, and complementarity into unity, not division.

What we got instead was a restlessness in Quebec, the French Canadians caught in an English Canadian embrace. The restlessness of Quebec became, in our own generation, a hostile Quebec and a Quebec asking whether the bargain would ever be kept or whether the political marriage should be put asunder. The answer in May, 1980, in a referendum in Quebec which was one of the most gripping political events we have ever experienced in this country, was an answer to try again within the Canadian context. It was a conditional answer which required the response of the nation as a whole. This joint resolution is evidence of that response.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Austin: This joint resolution will place within the Canadian constitutional context an explicit description of the rights of the English minority in the province of Quebec, of the French minorities in the other provinces of Canada, and it will ensure a process of political growth in Canada which will enhance those rights over time.

The Leader of the Opposition, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, and other members of his party have been fanning the argument that what we are asked to do here is the wilful act of one egocentric man, and they refer to the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau. While I find it hard to take the argument seriously because it so deeply shows its ignorance of the history of Canada, I feel, nonetheless, compelled not to leave the proposition unanswered. Does the Conservative leader fail totally to understand the just outcry of French-speaking Canadians? Does he fail to understand the just outcry of our aboriginal peoples? Does he fail to understand the just outcry of disadvantaged and discriminated-against Canadians all over our country? Does he fail to understand the commitments the national government proposes to make to ensure equalization to the provinces, to ensure the protection of multiculturalism, to ensure a more direct management of national resources by the provinces, which is a deep-seated concern of the western provinces? Are all of these things important to only one man? Are these things none of the concern of other Canadians?

I can tell the Leader of the Opposition and his followers what they already well know but do not want to admit: that the charge that this constitutional process is the wilful egotism of one man is a false and silly charge. In other places the Conservative Party has argued that the Liberal Party is seeking to create a unitary state, or that there is a choice to be made between a unitary state and a community of communities. These are deeply philosophical and practical issues which have been with us for more than a century. Are they created by the will of one man? No! They are the essence of Canada today.

But I admit, with pride and conviction, that one man, the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, has had the courage and conviction to confront these issues which have been so divisive in Canada for so long, and which have held back the just cause of so many individual Canadians for so long. No Canadian has grasped the meaning of Canada so deeply as Pierre Elliott Trudeau. His conviction and his courage are shared by his parliamentary party, are shared by me personally, are shared by the Liberal Party of Canada, and I believe they are sincerely shared by the people of Canada. I am convinced of that.

Canadians are torn by argument not so much on the Charter of Rights, which the polls show and which even the official opposition concedes a very substantial majority of Canadians support, but by the procedures for implementing these very desirable constitutional changes.

Canadians are concerned to understand why it is necessary for the Parliament of Canada to use its legal power to amend the Constitution by a Joint Address to the Parliament at Westminster rather than by finding some way of settling these questions between the federal government, on the one hand, and the provinces, on the other. The procedures which we are using are being questioned, and the issue must be addressed as clearly and as understandably as possible. The simple reality of Canada today is that we have not been able to agree to a joint federal and provincial amending procedure.

When we became a self-governing nation, the Fathers of Confederation were unable to agree to an amending procedure and, therefore, left the matter to the Parliament at Westminster. It quickly became the convention, both in Canada and in Great Britain, that the British North America Act would be amended only by an Address by the Parliament of Canada—that is, by the Senate and the House of Commons—to the Parliament of Great Britain. That became, and is today, the legal and constitutional way in which amendments to the British North America Act take place.

Throughout Canadian constitutional history, the federal government has discussed with the provinces how an amending procedure can be shaped in Canada to include the provinces which would eliminate the need for parliamentary action by the British Parliament. Only once, in all the history of these discussions, was there unanimity among the federal government and the provinces for an amending procedure. That was in Victoria, at the beginning of 1971, when it was agreed by all that the amending procedure would be by joint resolution of the Senate and the House of Commons, by resolution of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, by resolution of two or more of the Atlantic provinces, and by resolution of two or more of the four western provinces provided they reflected provinces having 50 per cent or more of the population of western Canada. As I have said, at no other time, in all the hours that have been devoted at countless federal-provincial conferences to this question, has there been any agreement for any other amending procedure for Canada.

The federal government, in the proposed resolution, has adopted that Victoria formula as the amending procedure to be used in Canada, subject to further discussions with the provinces over the next few years to see whether there could be agreement on some other procedure.

As honourable senators know, since that brief moment in Victoria of unanimous agreement, there has been nothing but retreat and change by the provinces on the question of an amending procedure. Within two weeks the Province of Quebec had withdrawn its agreement and was bargaining for more jurisdiction in the area of social policy. More weeks went by and other provinces, for one reason or another, found the need to bargain and, of course, governments changed and new perceptions of advantage occurred to the successor governments.

To me, nothing was more discouraging than to see the true meaning of "a community of communities"—to use the phrase made so well known by the Leader of the Opposition in the other place—in action at the September First Ministers' Conference. There was no sense there, among the Canadian provinces, of a Canadian nation or a responsibility on the part of the Canadian premiers for something greater than the immediate interests, as they saw them, of their provinces or their own political parties and their own positions within their political parties. The majority of the premiers took no responsibility to seek a consensus for Canada at any cost to themselves whatever. That, I suppose, is not surprising. After all, what Premier of British Columbia is going to show any great sensitivity to the electorate of New Brunswick, Quebec or Saskatchewan; and why should he? He is not accountable to them.

It was made demonstrably clear to me that the Fathers of Confederation were right in establishing the national Parliament as paramount in Canada. Only in the national Parliament can the interests of Canadians everywhere be addressed, dealt with, negotiated and assured; not in a community of communities, and not in a league of provinces.

But the question has been asked: Is the Government of Canada too impatient? Would it be possible, with yet more negotiation, for a consensus to be reached on an amending procedure? Should yet more time be taken before we deal with and redress the just complaints of so many Canadians? That depends on your view of whether there is any likelihood of changes on the part of the majority of provinces which do not support this joint resolution and which do not agree with the amending procedure agreed to by their predecessors in Victoria in 1971.

My answer is that none of us has seen any evidence whatever that the dissenting premiers will change their positions. The premiers met in Montreal just a short time ago; they didn't change their positions. Nothing but continuing dissention among themselves came out of that meeting. They could not even decide whether to do the ultimate in colonial folly and take themselves off to London to plead with the British Parliament, which has no substantive role whatever to play in this issue.

Does anyone think that Premier Lévesque has become a federalist? Does anyone think that Premier Peckford will change his view that it is the provinces that have the residual powers? Does anyone here think that Premier Lyon, Premier Lougheed or Premier Bennett will accept an amending formula, except one based on unanimity, or that they will accept a charter of rights? Does anyone know what Premier Blakeney thinks?

The Conservative Premier of New Brunswick, Premier Hatfield, told the joint committee, of which I had the honour to be a member, that the only result achieved by delay would be more delay. The Conservative Premier of Ontario, Premier Davis, has said that he supports unilateral action on the part of the national Parliament as the only way to break this historic impasse, and that he supports the Victoria formula. The Premier of Ontario has gone on to urge the Conservative members of the Senate and of the House of Commons, particularly those from Ontario, to support the joint resolution which is now before us.

Putting it in a nutshell, the decisive choice for this Parliament is whether to delay and, by delay, exacerbate the real problems of Canadians which are addressed by the Charter of Rights and by the other provisions of the joint resolution and, thereby, in my view, lose the unity which we have developed over so many years, or whether Parliament can now act to cut the Gordian knot, which has so frustrated and perplexed the Canadian nation for so long, and, by cutting it asunder, release the energies and talents of Canadians in a positive direction towards building a better society.

I believe the forces of Canadian energy have been too long restrained by the problems which have been created for us by our past divisiveness and dissention and by our negative provincialism. This unilateral act by Parliament will resolve the divisiveness in Canadian society today, not create it, for it has been with us for a very long time. It will quiet old issues that should be historical anachronisms, and it will allow us to renew our focus and to direct our energies towards ensuring economic and social justice to our citizens and allowing Canada to give stronger and more fulfilled attention to its role in the family of nations.

There is one other issue, honourable senators, that I must address, and that is the place of this chamber in the constitutional evolution of Canada. I am fully convinced of the need in our continental nation, composed as it is of so many different areas and experiences, for a second chamber which can serve as a balance wheel for the interests of communities which do not, by virtue of their population make-up, have decisive representation in the House of Commons. All of you are aware of the great disaffection which exists in my part of Canada, in western Canada, with the federal decision-making process. Whether true or not, the impression exists in western Canada that the national Parliament is dominated by the central provinces of Quebec and Ontario which, because their population represents some two-thirds of the population of the nation, dominate the decision-making and govern the nation in their own interests and without proper sensitivity towards western and Atlantic Canadians.

The old legal maxim is that justice must not only be done, but must be seen to be done. Certainly, in western Canada it is true that justice is not seen to be done by the national government and the national Parliament, where western interests are concerned. To be seen to be done, western Canadians, in the operation of this Parliament, must participate in the decision-making, must be seen to participate in the decision-making, and must take that participation back to their communities, showing those communities, directly, how their needs are being served.

I have to admit that part of the weakness of this national, federal process, our national Parliament, as seen by those in western Canada, is based on the realities, as they work their way through the Canadian community, of a long period in power of the Liberal Party. Because the Liberal Party has been in power for a long period of time, it has been the perception of those in western Canada that the Liberal Party governs for the votes of those in central Canada. The result is a protest which is translated more and more into the support of those who are not in government. So we have a Catch-22, a revolving problem. The more the centre appears to govern through the Liberal Party, the more western Canadians protest and opt out of a role in the decision-making process through the Liberal Party.

I want to make it clear to all honourable senators, who I know are as convinced about this as I am, that the political parties are the foundation stones of our democracy. The Liberal Party, the Progressive Conservative Party, the New Democratic Party, through their activities, ensure Canadians a voice in Canadian society, ensure that the arguments are heard in a fair and democratic way.

I believe very strongly that western Canadians do have a perception which all of us in the national process must address. It has been a vicious circle and it must be broken. To deal with the rejection of the national process by people in western Canada, it is my conviction that we must create a Senate of Canada with a larger representation from the western region than we have had up to now; we must create a Senate of Canada that retains the power to represent regional interests within the context of the federal process; we must create a Senate of Canada in which the voices of western Canadians and Atlantic Canadians are meaningful, substantial, and, when in concert with some opinions and support in central Canada, can be decisive.

In my view, the credibility of senators in the context of what Canada is today must be based on a form of proportional election. To do otherwise would mean that regardless of the constitutional responsibility of an appointed senator from western Canada, he or she would still face the dominant political attitude in the Commons that the person appointed has no mandate to oppose the person elected.

I will not dwell at any length on the proposals which I made in this chamber in December, 1978 for a proportionally elected Senate. Since that time I have spoken to many senators, and I know there is increasing interest in this chamber for a study in that direction. What I do wish to say is that we have retained our powers for a public purpose. The proposal of the government, as it was in the old section 44, has been dropped by the government. We have retained the powers that were given to us by the Fathers of Confederation. But it is clear—and I know that all honourable senators share my views on this matter—that we have not been able to retain those powers, or have been interested in retaining those powers, for any individual interest of any of us. We have a public trust to discharge in the second stage of constitutional reform which lies ahead of us, a change in this body, where we will see the focus of the hopes of the regions of Canada again on the Senate, as they were in the original processes that led to the creation of this body, a process that once came from Quebec and will now come aggressively from western Canada.

We have argued that we must retain our current powers in order to discharge our present trust. We have argued that the concerns of our regions are not the property alone of the premiers and cannot be entrusted alone to the premiers—and we have been listened to.

Senator Flynn: Did you argue that in the committee?

Senator Austin: I certainly did.

Senator Flynn: In the committee?

Senator Austin: In committee.

Senator Flynn: I do not remember having seen anything about that.

Senator Austin: I will send you copies of my remarks.

I would like to say one last word about the Charter. The defence of the Charter is very simple. It is certainly simple for me, because I believe in a very fundamental proposition, namely, that those less favoured by life should be more favoured by law. That is what we are doing with our Charter of Rights.

I cannot accept, with all the good will that I have toward the historic concerns which are being expressed by the Conservative Party about the role of the provinces, an argument that federal politicians, members of the national Parliament, can look in the eye the problems of Canadians, as I have looked at those problems through the committee, and then say, "Oh well, we will dispense all of this justice in the good time that the provinces will give us." Honourable senators, I do not believe that is good enough for Canada or for Canadians. I do not believe that the process which we have experienced over decades allows premiers to depart from their particular provincial constituencies to join in a national constituency. It certainly does not allow it very often, and I am not prepared to believe that we should wait another 104 years from 1971 to see the next time a point of unanimity will occur among the premiers and with the federal government.

We have to accept that there is a fundamental clash between the interests of provincial governments and the interests of a national government. Provincial governments are entitled to their views. I make no claim that they should desist from representing their interests as fully in our process as they wish; but it will be a lack of cognition, a lack of understanding about Canada, a lack of knowledge of the crises in Canadian society, if we as national parliamentarians do not come to grips with our responsibilities. That is the decisive question that is before us. I hope that through this debate, through the acceptance by Parliament of this joint resolution, we will build a stronger federal process, and, most important of all, a stronger nation.

On motion of Senator Tremblay, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

NORTHERN PIPELINE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, February 17, 1981, moved:

> That the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline be authorized to examine and consider the subject-matter of the Bill C-60, intituled: "An Act to amend the National Energy Board Act", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, by way of explanation, the purpose of my motion, which I commend to your attention, is to provide authority for the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline to give pre-study to Bill C-60, an Act to amend the National Energy Board Act, which deals primarily with right-of-way acquisition procedures for pipeline construction.

Bill C-60 in many respects is the successor to Bill S-12 which was proposed by the Northern Pipeline Committee in 1979. It was introduced in the Senate by our colleague, Senator Olson, who at that time was chairman of the committee. Great credit should go to Senator Olson who, in reality, was the author of Bill S-12. In any event, the bill passed the Senate at that time but died on the order paper in the other place. Bill C-60 has now been introduced in the other place as a government bill by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Honourable senators, pre-study of the bill, or prior examination, will permit the committee to hear the evidence from industry or anyone interested in putting forward their views, and will certainly expedite passage of the bill in the Senate when it arrives here. Accordingly I commend the motion to your favourable consideration.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable W. R. McIntyre, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

> An Act to amend laws relating to fiscal transfers to the provinces.
> An Act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, and other Acts subsequent to 1970.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 24, 1981 at 8 p.m.

ESTONIA

SIXTY-THIRD ANNIVERSARY OF PROCLAMATION OF INDEPENDENCE

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that today, February 24, marks the sixty-third anniversary of the proclamation of the independence of the Estonian Democratic Republic, which is being celebrated by the Estonians of Canada, the United States and other countries of the free world. After having been subjugated and oppressed for centuries by the Russian czarist régime, on this day in 1918 Estonia, by the will of her people, became a free state with an advanced democratic constitution. The other two Baltic nations, Latvia and Lithuania, also proclaimed independence and established democratic states, following the example of the Ukraine, which had earlier proclaimed independence and statehood on January 22, 1918.

The free Estonians prospered under their democratic government and lived in peace and harmony with their neighbours.

Although the Soviet Union had recognized the independence and sovereignty of the three Baltic states in 1920, that did not deter the communist government from invading those countries in June, 1940. With the connivance of Hitler, Stalin annexed the Baltic states, incorporating them as Soviet "republics." The leaders were arrested and large numbers of people were persecuted and brutally deported to Siberia.

Despite Soviet adherence to the Helsinki Final Act, the Estonians are living and suffering under the oppressive Soviet regime which denies them their fundamental freedoms and human rights.

Honourable senators, Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania were given full recognition in 1921 by the Supreme Council of the Allied Powers. The Baltic states were immediately admitted into the League of Nations. The United States gave them de jure recognition in 1922. Consequently, the western powers did not, and still do not, recognize the annexation of the Baltic states by the U.S.S.R. in 1940. Canada and the United States, up to the present time, do not recognize this Soviet occupation, but give recognition to the consuls of the Baltic states who reside here. For several years these consuls have been recognized when they have visited the Senate and House of Commons chambers. They will again visit our chamber this year on March 4, at the time of the Baltic Evening on Parliament Hill. That colourful and entertaining cultural event is sponsored and supported by parliamentarians of both houses.

Today I should like to congratulate the Canadian citizens of Estonian ancestry for their devotion to the principles of freedom and democracy, and pay tribute to them for their many contributions to their adopted country.

I believe that all honourable senators will join with me in this tribute and in extending our very best wishes to the Estonians for the realization of the freedom of their homeland. Canada is a better country for having accepted them as citizens, and they, in turn, are happy to live and work in full freedom.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I should like to concur with the sentiments expressed by Senator Yuzyk. The account given by the senator on the tragic history of Free Estonia is, for me, a very personal matter. Many honourable senators know that I see the tragedy of Free Estonia in the face of someone I love and respect very much, my father-in-law, who just by chance was able to escape the communist freight cars which were to carry him and his family to the Soviet Union. His crime was that he was a writer, lawyer and a member of the parliament of Free Estonia. He fled across the Baltic Sea, some 200 miles, with his wife and his two young children, one of whom is now my wife. For me, the plight of Free Estonia is very real.

After almost one thousand years this little land of approximately one million people saw the flame of freedom, opportunity and independence go out. These people had formulated a constitution for their parliamentary system which is worthy of study and which is exemplary to the world. For the Estonians in Canada commemorating this independence, it is both a sad and bitter memory. Yet, they feel they have an obligation to do so in this free land of ours because they want Canadians to be aware of how fragile freedom is and to let us know how preciously they love their freedom in this country. They ask us also to recognize the constant threat of an aggressive communist system to all free people.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Department of the Solicitor General of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 5 of the Department of the Solicitor General Act, Chapter S-12, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the National Capital Commission, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to sections 75(3) and 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

Capital Budget of the National Capital Commission for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, as approved by Order in Council P.C. 1981-233, dated January 29, 1981.

Capital Budget of Air Canada for the year ending December 31, 1981, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1981-320, dated February 5, 1981, approving same.

THE ROYAL FAMILY

BETROTHAL OF H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES TO LADY DIANA SPENCER—ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that the following message has been received from the House of Commons:

RESOLVED: That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's Loyal Subjects, the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, respectfully desire to express our great happiness to Your Majesty and His Royal Highness the Prince Philip on the announcement of the engagement and forthcoming marriage of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and Lady Diana Spencer, and to assure Your Majesty that this happy announcement is greeted by the Members of the House of Commons with great joy.

ORDERED: That the said Address be engrossed; and

That a Message be sent to the Senate informing Their Honours that this House has passed the said Address and requesting Their Honours to unite with this House in the said Address.

ATTEST:

C. B. Koester
The Clerk of the House of Commons.

Honourable senators, when shall this message be taken into consideration?

● (2010)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government), seconded by the Honourable Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule (1)(b), moved:

That the Senate do agree with the House of Commons in the said Address by filling up the blank spaces left therein with the words "Senate and".

He said: All honourable senators rejoice in the announcement made in London today. We welcome the very happy news from Buckingham Palace and wish to join with the other place in expressing our best wishes and happiness to Her Majesty the Queen and to His Royal Highness the Prince Philip on the occasion of the forthcoming marriage of Lady Diana Spencer to their son the Prince of Wales.

[Senator Perrault.]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in the name of my leader, the Honourable Senator Flynn, and other honourable senators in the opposition, I am delighted to join in this expression of sincere good wishes to Lady Diana Spencer and hearty congratulations to the Prince of Wales.

Prince Charles was born to the Throne, and I suppose his first test was to combine the inherited qualities of character and personality with the acquired arts of the democratic monarch. I hope it may be allowed for someone such as myself to say that I believe he has passed that test in an excellent fashion.

The second test, of course, is to choose a young woman, not only to be his wife but also, in time, to be the Queen of the constitutional monarchy which stretches around the Commonwealth.

The Princess of Wales to be is a most admirable and lovable person in herself, with every sign of being able to perform the task of an able and successful helpmeet; and when, in Providence's good time, she comes to the Crown matrimonial, modeling herself, as I believe she will, on the splendid example of the present Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, she will prove to be a worthy successor to those who have worn that Crown in times gone by.

We join in the motion expressed in the House of Commons, and as stated by the Leader of the Government in this chamber, in congratulating the Prince of Wales and bidding a hearty welcome to our future Queen.

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Ordered, That the Clerk do go down to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that the Senate do agree to the Address to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen expressing our great happiness to Her Majesty and His Royal Highness the Prince Philip on the announcement of the engagement and forthcoming marriage of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and Lady Diana Spencer, and have inserted in the blank spaces therein the words "Senate and".

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I now move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin:

That the Honourable the Speaker do sign the said Address to Her Majesty the Queen on behalf of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

ADDRESS TO THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government), seconded by the Honourable Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(b), moved:

That the following Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General, namely:—

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Edward Richard Schreyer, Chancellor and Principal Companion of the Order of Canada, Chancellor and Commander of the Order of Military Merit upon whom has been conferred the Canadian Forces' Decoration, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada:

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:

The Senate of Canada, in Parliament assembled, have agreed to an Address to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen expressing our great happiness to Her Majesty and His Royal Highness the Prince Philip on the announcement of the engagement and forthcoming marriage of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and Lady Diana Spencer, and respectfully request that Your Excellency will be pleased to transmit the said Address to Her Majesty the Queen.

Motion agreed to.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin:

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House that the Senate have passed the said Address and request the House of Commons to unite with this House in the said Address to His Excellency the Governor General by inserting therein the words "and Commons".

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Ordered, That the Clerk do go down to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that the Senate have passed an Address to His Excellency the Governor General respectfully requesting that His Excellency may be pleased to transmit the said Address to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen expressing our great happiness to Her Majesty and His Royal Highness the Prince Philip on the announcement of the engagement and forthcoming marriage of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and Lady Diana Spencer, and request the House of Commons to unite with this House in the Address to His Excellency the Governor General by inserting therein the words "and Commons".

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin:

That the Honourable the Speaker do sign the said Address to His Excellency the Governor General on behalf of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Tuesday, February 24, 1981

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill S-17, intituled: "An Act to implement conventions between Canada and New Zealand and Canada and Australia for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax," has, in obedience to the order of reference of Wednesday, December 17, 1980, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

A. I. Barrow
Deputy Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Henry D. Hicks moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Tuesday, February 24, 1981

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill C-54, intituled: "An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax," has, in obedience to the order of reference of Thursday, February 19, 1981, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

A. I. Barrow
Deputy Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

• (2020)

Senator Barrow: Honourable senators, I should like to say at this time that while Bill C-54 was referred to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee only last Thursday, the subject matter of the measure was referred to the committee on February 5. The committee met on five occasions over the past two weeks. During the course of its meetings it carefully reviewed Bill C-54 with its advisers and officials of the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue. As a result, the committee has prepared a lengthy report.

However, it is important that the bill be passed without delay. Many taxpayers throughout Canada are awaiting refunds of tax, which can only be processed after passage of the bill. In order to avoid the delay, which will result if we wait for the report to be translated, Senator McIlraith has moved that the bill be read the third time at the next sitting. The report, which has been prepared as a report on the subject matter of the bill, will be tabled within the next few days.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask a question of my honourable friend about this matter? He is telling us that the committee has prepared a substantial report on the subject matter of the bill, but will we have an opportunity to look at it before third reading is proceeded with? I ask that question because, unfortunately, I did not have the opportunity to attend the committee meetings as I would like to have done. If the honourable senator tells me that the report contains no recommendations for changes in the bill, that is one thing, but if there are such recommendations, that might be something else.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I believe that I can clarify the matter. There were two distinct and separate references to the committee, one being—I do not recall the date—

Senator Connolly: February 5.

Senator McIlraith: —on February 5, which had to do with the pre-study of the bill. That report has not yet been presented to the Senate. It has not been finally completed because of its length and its translation, but it does not recommend changes to the bill. The second reference to the committee was after second reading of the bill itself. That report is what is now before the Senate, and it simply reports the bill without amendment. The other report that will be tabled in a few days does not recommend any changes in the bill, but there are quite lengthy discussions and a good deal of material in it.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his explanation, but I am a little disturbed that the committee has a lengthy report which would probably make for interesting reading, and apparently we will not have an opportunity to see it before third reading is completed. Is that the situation?

Senator McIlraith: Yes, that is really the situation, because unfortunately the bill itself does contemplate changes that affect some returns that have to be made by February 28 and others by April 30. It also affects certain refunds of overpayments of taxes, and may affect certain contracts that are dependent on the tax law.

There is another matter that I should add. The bill itself does not have any common theme running through it. It is a collection of many items having their origin, as I sought to explain on second reading, in different budgets, or budget speeches, in the past. It affects the tax practitioners who have to make these returns immediately, and who are trying to get refunds of overpayments as soon as possible. It is highly desirable that these people get this legislation into their hands at the earliest possible moment.

[Senator Barrow.]

That is the view of the committee, and that is the situation that confronts us. The committee considered the matter of how to report the two references and came to the conclusion that the better way was to proceed with an immediate report on the bill itself. The other report, of course, is ready to go forward as soon as it can be translated.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have to express my unhappiness with the fact that that report is not available. I might even be persuaded to change my vote on third reading if I had a chance to read it. I am wondering if it might be possible for an anglophone to have a chance to read the other report before third reading comes up, even if it is not translated. I understand from the house leader that there is some urgency with regard to getting this bill passed by a certain date. I appreciate that, and I have heard from my colleague, Senator Smith, on the subject; but I would still appreciate seeing that report before we vote on third reading.

Senator McIlraith: Perhaps your colleague, Senator Smith, would brief you on it. He is a very good adviser to honourable senators, and I think he can allay your anxieties on the subject. I shall try to obtain a copy of the report in English in the morning and send it to you.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, my only comment on the remarks of Senator McIlraith are these, that if my reputation as a convincer or as an adviser depended on the number of times I have been able to convince him, his remarks this evening would not be justified.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I think there is quite an important point here. This question of pre-study is something that we have invented, or that better men than I in the Senate have invented, and generally we have agreed that it is a useful thing. Now it appears we are going to have two types of reports, and I would not like that to be established as a precedent without further consideration.

While I am certainly not prepared to hold up third reading because of my particular view on this matter tomorrow, I hope that we shall be very careful about creating some new style of committee report which seems to undercut the normal process of the consideration of a bill. Potentially, at any rate, that report might influence the views of those who are called upon to vote on the bill.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question that I address to the Honourable Minister of State for Economic Development. I suppose he is familiar with the speech delivered yesterday by his colleague, the Minister of Finance, to the Canadian Club of Montreal, in which the Minister of Finance appears to be edging into that elusive industrial strategy of the government that we are all so interested in knowing something about. The minister said:

> We must also encourage the movement of productive resources, those industrial activities with diminishing prospects, to strong and potentially strong industries in some sectors.

That is an unexceptional comment, but I would like to know what plans the government has to consult with both the provinces that have a constitutional interest in this territory and the industries that have an economic interest in this territory, with a view to arriving at some consensus. I presume it is not the intention of the federal government to proceed without those consultations.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will put that specific question to the Minister of Finance. I would not like the honourable senator to draw from that statement—which he said is unexceptional as far as he is concerned—that there are some plans now for a significant move, in any direction, in the absence of some consultation. This government recognizes that there are some very important responsibilities which fall within the provincial jurisdiction, but we would, through the consultative process, not only try to ascertain from them what the coordinated effort might be, but also obtain their views on what each of the provincial jurisdictions is going to do if, indeed, they have some hard plans. Therefore, what we are doing will be in concert with them.

Senator Roblin: I am glad my honourable friend will ask what the minister meant by his statement. I think that is what he is telling me. I would be very interested to know because we have heard many statements of this kind from other people, as time has gone by, and nothing has happened. I would be interested not only in an explanation of what the minister meant but also in what his timetable is. Has he any idea in mind as to when he is going to tackle this problem with the provinces and the industries concerned? It is not a matter which I think anyone in this country would like to see left dangling much longer.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, you can take the view, if you like, that the government may be becoming more deeply involved in the economy, but I think what the minister was expressing was a fairly accurate definition of a dynamic economy. Some of the things that he talked about, not only in that particular quotation but in other parts of that speech, indicate that as well.

Senator Roblin: Well, that is exactly the case, but the minister said, "We must also encourage . . ." I presume he is talking about the government, among others. I want to know whether this is just a blithe expression or whether it has some substance.

Senator Olson: I will ask the Minister of Finance whether he would want to give some kind of reply to the question. I could take great exception to some of the terminology used, but I am in such a peaceful frame of mind that I will not.

Hon. Lowell Murray: By way of a supplementary question, will the minister say why the government refuses to consult with the provinces or involve them in a $350 million program announced some time ago to take effect in six centres across the country, involving, as it does, industrial restructuring, manpower retraining and mobility, all of which fall at least partially under provincial jurisdiction? I ask the question particularly because of the statement made this afternoon by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to the effect that this program might well serve as a model for future programs in the general field of industrial strategy.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not sure that I accept the flat statement that the government refuses to consult. On the other hand, I think that it has been made clear from the beginning that this is a federally initiated and federally funded program and, therefore, we have an obligation to administer it, at least to that extent. I think the honourable senator will perhaps have to accept the fact that there are some federal responsibilities in those areas as well, and we are trying to discharge them.

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO CHRYSLER CORPORATION—AMENDED AND RESTATED LOAN INSURANCE AGREEMENT

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Before I get into the question, I wonder whether the minister would mind lifting up his microphone a little. I am afraid I am missing some of these pearls. Thank you, sir.

Senator Olson: Turn up the volume.

Senator Doody: It is all right for me; I can read them tomorrow in Hansard, but others might not have that advantage.

Senator Murray: We can all read.

Senator Donahoe: But you may not have the advantage of—

Senator Doody: That is terrible; that is awful. I wish you were on the other side of the house, senator; I would give you an awful tongue lashing.

On Wednesday I asked some questions of the honourable minister relative to the Chrysler deal, and on Thursday the minister was kind enough to give me a delayed answer—at least, it was a partial answer. Some of the matters involved in that are still somewhat unclear. I asked: Will it be possible for Chrysler to receive in total the original $200 million in loan guarantees from the federal government without investing the $1 billion they had originally promised to? The original deal was, "We will give you $200 million in guarantees if you will undertake to invest $1 billion." In the second phase of the arrangement, the investment arrangement has decreased considerably. Has the government guarantee decreased proportionately? My understanding now is that there was $150 million plus $50 million, which comes to the same amount. I am still unclear on that. I have looked at the statement, the press release and at the answer, and I still do not know if the Government of Canada is committed to a $200 million guarantee without the company's commitment to invest $1 billion.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am distressed that the honourable senator cannot understand what he reads in that delayed answer which I gave him, because it is pretty clear to me that the $150 million in guarantees will be activated by an investment of somewhere between $600 million and $700 million. The investment was specified; it was to add a capability for assembly of the K cars and the truck plant. If the honourable senator reads the rest of it very carefully, he will note that there is a possibility of an additional $50 million in guarantees if Chrysler does in fact undertake further investment over and above the $600 million to $700 million. One specific example was an engine plant, either to reactivate one, which means a lot of re-tooling, or to build another engine plant in Canada. Of course, if that were to happen on a world-scale market requirement, then my honourable friend could add that up and I am sure that he would come to the point where it might be even more than $1 billion in total.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, the minister can save himself a lot of distress—and I am sorry that I have caused him this discomfort—by telling me if it is a $1 billion investment, more than $1 billion or less than $1 billion, and if the ultimate government commitment of that guarantee is $200 million or $150 million. Is it $150 million or $200 million, and what exactly is Chrysler's commitment for investment in the country?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will try again. There is a specific $150 million in guarantees for a specific investment of somewhere between $600 million and $700 million, and this investment is well spelled out in the documents that I passed to him. There is an additional $50 million, to look after additional investments that cannot be specific at this time although the activities can be.

Senator Doody: I remember one of the honourable minister's predecessors saying, "What's a million?" Now we are talking about $600 million or $700 million, give or take $100 million. I suppose it must be the inflationary process that the honourable minister's government is putting us through that distorts the numbers.

Perhaps we can get down to specifics, as the honourable minister has suggested. For how long beyond 1985 is Chrysler, under this agreement, obliged to guarantee the 12,000-odd jobs which it promised would be in effect at that time? I know the projection is to 1985 for the commitment of the guarantee, but what commitment does the company have with respect to jobs for Canadians who hope to work there?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we hope and expect that this refinancing of Chrysler, and the massive investment involved in it, will turn the company in Canada, and even beyond Canada, into a viable operation. If that happens, those jobs could go on for a very long time. If it does not happen in the timeframe between now and when the investment is made, then the Government of Canada is not committed to that investment.

It seems to me that the honourable senator is asking for some precision on predictability of the viability of the automobile market, especially in North America and even more especially in Canada. If he wants to try to work that out beyond 1985 himself, perhaps he will realize that in asking for a firm, hard projection in terms of what condition the industry will be in at that time, he is being a little unfair. Well, he can ask for it anyway, but I just don't think anybody can give him an answer to that, except to say that it will be excellent, if the automobile industry has been revived and this is a part of it; on the other hand, if the industry drops off and the market becomes less than viable, then I suppose we will have to live with what we have.

Senator Doody: I have just one final supplementary, because obviously we are not going to get all that far with this. Would the honourable minister agree with me that we could say, in summation, that we will have our commitment of $150 million, perhaps $200 million, on the line up until 1985 and beyond, but the company's obligations will be contingent on the marketplace?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, apart from the question of contingency, before that undertaking is made that investment has to take place, or at least it must be concurrent with it. So my honourable friend must accept that those are the terms and conditions. We are not underwriting or making any payment unless and until those investments that are very clearly laid out in the agreement are in fact made.

If he wants to go the next step and ask us to say, if I may repeat myself, what the automobile market may be like in 1986, 1988 or 1990, all I can say is that all those things that are foreseeable now are being done in ways that would have the Chrysler component of that total automobile-producing industry in good condition to meet and cope with the competition.

If that is not so, my honourable friend knows what the results will be.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I followed with great interest the exchange between the Minister of State for Economic Development and Senator Doody. I may have come to the wrong conclusion from that exchange, but what the minister seems to be saying is that, if Chrysler is successful, the government investment will be recovered in terms of employment and general economic benefit to the country; if, however, Chrysler is not successful, the government will have lost its $150 million or $200 million, whatever the amount may be. I don't know that that is what he has said, but that is what it sounded like to me. Perhaps he could enlighten me.

Senator Olson: No, honourable senators, that is not what I said.

Senator Smith: Then perhaps you will enlighten me on what you did say.

Senator Olson: I can, if you want me to repeat again what I have already said.

Senator Smith: You don't need to repeat anything.

Senator Olson: I can do that, if you want, but it seems to me that anyone in this chamber ought to know that it is not exactly a precise science to predict the marketability of products four, five or six years down the road. My honourable friend who just asked the question ought to know about that.

Senator Smith: I know a great deal about that. That is why I find myself entirely confused by the exchange. I don't want to be too vigorous about this, although, having some experience in this matter, I could advise my honourable friend what he might expect to find. All I am asking now is whether the government is betting, to put it in the vernacular, its $200 million, or $150 million, upon the success of Chrysler, and will win, if Chrysler wins, but will lose, if Chrysler loses. That is all I am asking. I am not asking for any predictions. I am just asking what the conditions are.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend should realize that there are conditions attached to whether the guarantees will become operative at all. If they do become operative and Chrysler fails eight or ten years from now, I suppose problems will arise, although we may have some of those guarantees back before that happens. When there is a massive failure of a company as large as Chrysler—and there are many others of that magnitude in the country—it creates problems for our economy.

Senator Smith: The honourable gentleman is obviously reluctant to admit what now seems clear to me to be the truth, that they had, indeed, bet upon the success of Chrysler, and that, if Chrysler wins, the government wins and the public wins, but if Chrysler loses, the government loses the money it put up.

Senator Asselin: Say yes or no.

Senator Smith: There is nothing wrong with that. I am not quarrelling with it. I just want to know whether that is the situation. By failing to be frank in his answer about it, the Minister of State for Economic Development has simply made himself appear to wish to avoid giving the facts.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not think what I have said is at all unclear. It is perfectly clear to me.

Senator Smith: There are many things that seem to be clear to you which are not clear to anybody else.

Senator Olson: Well, that is their problem.

Senator Perrault: The heavy water plant is not clear to us.

Senator Smith: If you want to talk about that, I will tell you about it!

Senator Olson: I also have an obligation, however, to assist those who find things are not quite as clear to them as they ought to be.

You see, the honourable senator is trying to induce me to make a simple answer without adding any qualifications, but there are many qualifications contained in the agreement and in the press release, and so on. If the honourable senator wants to simplify the matter and leave out all of those qualifications, then, I am sorry, but a simple yes or no is not an accurate answer.

Senator Smith: I will not pursue this any longer except to say that the honourable gentleman, if he will not give a simple answer, must expect to find himself criticized in many ways, not only for that but for agreeing to a deal of this kind.

As for the honourable gentleman who mentioned the heavy water plant, I would dearly love to debate with him on that matter, but I don't suppose the house wants to listen to me explain why the federal government is responsible for losing a great deal of the money of the people of Canada and of Nova Scotia on that matter.

Senator Olson: In conclusion, I want to say that I think it is unfortunate that the honourable senator is trying now to have an oversimplification in the answer.

● (2050)

If there is anything I like it is directness and simplicity, but if that kind of reply does not in fact include the qualifications which make it an accurate answer, then, of course, I have an obligation to hold accuracy even higher than simplicity. I am sorry if my honourable friend does not like it, but that is the way it is.

Senator Smith: It is not a matter of what I like or do not like; it is a matter of whether it is a fair and proper way of dealing with the public of Canada and their tax money.

Hon. R. James Balfour: May I address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development? In his delayed answer to my question with regard to the Chrysler loan, the minister said that it is not the intent of the government to penalize the company during its current difficulties. In the interest of simplicity, will the minister indicate the amount of the so-called penalty which the government agreed to defer and the precise terms of the government's commitment in this regard?

Senator Olson: I will take the question as notice. I will also fill in some of the other areas to which conditions are also attached and which are very important to the complete and accurate answer required by the question.

ENERGY

CONSTRUCTION OF VANCOUVER ISLAND PIPELINE—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The National Energy Program released last fall indicated that the government was setting aside up to $0.5 billion to support the construction of pipelines to the east coast and Vancouver Island. In response to various forms of questions on a couple of occasions, the Leader of the Government in the Senate has affirmed the existence and the purpose of that fund. My understanding is that the Minister of Energy has now said that federal assistance for the construction of the Vancouver Island pipeline may not be forthcoming. Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate indicate whether this government intends to honour its commitment made just last October?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government has a long-standing reputation for keeping its promises.

Senator Asselin: In the election campaign only.

Senator Frith: Hang on, there is Senator Flynn.

Senator Perrault: I welcome the Leader of the Opposition this evening.

Honourable senators, there is no question that the government will not renege on its pledge to assist in natural gas pipeline construction. Of course, plans and proposals must be studied in order to determine the feasibility of any proposed pipeline, its route, whether it is in the public interest and whether it efficiently serves as many citizens as possible.

Senator Nurgitz: I have a supplementary question. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources today in the other place said that included in the negotiations to take place with the British Columbia government would be the matter of why they chose the option to have B.C. Hydro, rather than some other concern, build the pipeline. That very question might be behind why the funds were given or why they were not given. Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate confirm for us that this is one of the criteria for giving those funds?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that consideration was encompassed in my previous response with regard to whether or not the proposed pipeline route and construction proposals are clearly in the public interest. I understand there are at least two entities interested in building that pipeline in British Columbia. One is Westcoast Transmission, which is owned in part by Petro-Canada and by B.C. Resources Investment Corporation. The other entity is B.C. Hydro. The proposal is under study.

Senator Nurgitz: I have one final supplementary question. Is the granting of the funds for the construction of the Vancouver Island pipeline conditional upon Westcoast Transmission obtaining that job? Is that the criteria by which they will or will not grant the funds?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question is under study. That portion of the senator's question will be taken as notice and further details will be provided.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SPAIN—ATTEMPTED COUP D'ÉTAT

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, my question is appropriately directed to the Leader of the Government. Considering the very grave trials through which the Cortes of Spain passed yesterday and considering our satisfaction, which, I am sure, all of us must feel, that they have passed through this serious challenge, following the proper attitude and actions of the constitutional authorities there, will the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate find some way through consultations with the Department of External Affairs, possibly with the other house and with parliamentary associations, to convey to our parliamentary brothers in the Cortes our satisfaction that their parliamentary life has been properly resumed, and that they may do the kind of things that we are doing in this chamber and in other chambers in Canada from day to day.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator's suggestions will certainly be conveyed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. His proposal may have real merit.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. On February 11 the minister made a statement to this house with respect to the new deal on the sale of coal to Japan. After he had exhausted his burst of hyperbole in praise of the results of that deal, I asked him a very simple question, which is reported at page 1636 of Hansard, as to whether benefits which are expected to flow to the extractive industries as a result of the sale of this unprocessed resource would also flow to the manufacturing industry. The minister's reply was to the effect that not only would they sell coal, possibly through Ridley, but they would also sell potash and sulphur. He did not in any way indicate at that time that any of the manufactured products of the country would be made available.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance made a speech—and I hope the minister will listen very carefully because I am about to quote from it exactly—in which he said:

> —maximizing the resource-based growth opportunities available to Canadians does not simply mean more digging up, catching, cutting down or pumping out of our resources for export in unprocessed or initially processed form.

Having read that statement, and having considered the answer given to my question by the honourable minister, my question tonight is: Will the government be taking another look at the B.C. coal deal in the context of this newly articulated industrial strategy?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the coal will be delivered in the form in which it will be used by the buyers. That is at a level of upgrading which can be reached within this country. My honourable friend should also realize that a great deal of industrial activity will be generated as a result of an investment of approximately $2.5 billion in the mines and the delivery system which will be used. This investment is important to our economy. I presume that my honourable friend will agree with me that much of that equipment will be purchased throughout the country.

NEWFOUNDLAND

SEAL HUNT PROTEST ACTIVITIES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government regarding the annual seal hunt which will take place within the next two or three weeks.

According to a newspaper report today, certain supposed conservationists are threatening to spray blue dye on thousands of seal pups to ruin their commercial value. In their hypocrisy, they are obviously not aware of the adverse effects which would come about as a result of that spraying.

Would the Leader of the Government advise what action the government is taking to stop this ridiculous intended action? If he does not have an answer now, would he investigate and report back to the Senate as soon as possible?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate the courtesy of the honourable senator in providing prior notice. Unfortunately, I do not as yet have a reply. Therefore, the question will be taken as notice.

Senator Marshall: As a supplementary to emphasize the seriousness of the situation, last year, when I posed a similar question, a report from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans indicated that certain types of spraying could be especially serious to the seal pup and, further, that certain dyes interfere with the mother seal's ability to identify her own young. It further advised that, depending on the extent of spraying, this could seriously compromise the seal's chances of survival.

Would the Leader of the Government request the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to warn the three reported, hypocritical conservationists or, indeed, to apprehend them until the seal hunt is over? Alternatively, would he request that they be denied a permit to visit the seal hunt this year?

Senator Perrault: Inquiries will proceed with respect to the concern for seal pups expressed by the honourable senator.

ENERGY

VANCOUVER ISLAND PIPELINE—REFUSAL OF GOVERNMENT OF BRITISH COLUMBIA TO PERMIT INQUIRY

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the announcement made a few days ago by the Government of the Province of British Columbia. This announcement relates to the extension of a natural gas pipeline from the mainland of British Columbia to Vancouver Island.

The Government of Canada has given some form of commitment to give assistance to a natural gas pipeline extension from the mainland of British Columbia to Vancouver Island.

Would the Leader of the Government tell us whether there is any undertaking presently extant to assist the gas pipeline to be constructed by B.C. Hydro, and whether the government is at all concerned by the decision of the Government of the Province of British Columbia not to permit an inquiry before the Public Utilities Commission of the Province of British Columbia, and not to allow Westcoast Transmission, one of the applicants, its opportunity to present the merits of its application?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the matter was referred to, in part, in an earlier question.

The government is interested in the decision of the Government of the Province of British Columbia. The proposal to have B.C. Hydro build the line is presently under study.

The question will be taken as notice and a fuller statement brought to the Senate.

GRAIN

ADJUSTMENT OF INITIAL PRICES—ANNOUNCEMENT BY MINISTER OF STATE FOR THE CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board regarding grain prices and grain payments to farmers.

About four weeks ago the minister indicated the new initial adjusted prices and also that there would be an adjustment payment mailed to farmers. It is my understanding that none of the cheques has been mailed or, at least, received.

Would the minister indicate the reason for the delay and whether and when the farmers can expect to receive the payments?

Senator Smith: Not all of four pages.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, you cannot check here if you do not have an answer, and, if you have an answer, honourable senators are not satisfied. I have an answer and, I believe, it is an adequate answer.

Honourable senators, the question was raised in the other place and I believe both houses should have the information. If the other house does not have it, then we may as well have it here.

On January 9, 1981 it was announced that the final payment for the 1979-80 crop year, totalling over $730 million, would be made to prairie grain producers. This required a total of over one-third of a million cheques—some 336,000—to be mailed. Mailing of these cheques began on January 19 and was completed on February 6.

Senator Smith: Where is the Post Office?

Senator Argue: On January 28, 1981 an announcement was made that, effective February 2, 1981, an adjustment to the intitial price would be made and that an adjustment payment on Wheat Board delivery, made from August 1 to February 1 to the 1980-81 crop year totalling some $450 million, would be made and the Canadian Wheat Board would begin mailing these cheques within the next few weeks. The Canadian Wheat Board has advised that these cheques will begin to be mailed in just over two weeks, on March 16.

When considering the length of time of approximately 30 working days required by the Canadian Wheat Board to make these adjustment payments, several factors must be considered. The grain companies, who are agents on behalf of the Canadian Wheat Board, were still buying grain from producers at the original initial price up to and including January 31, 1981. The grain companies then had a period of about two weeks—that is, until February 13, 1981—to report all purchases, adjustments and corrections to the Canadian Wheat Board. The Canadian Wheat Board continued to process the purchases, adjustments and corrections up to and including February 18, 1981.

The Canadian Wheat Board then requires a period of approximately three weeks for their auditing procedures. These procedures are usually completed after the normal daily routines have been completed and are done, basically, beyond normal working hours. At the end of this period the actual cheques will be printed and will be finished by March 10.

The cheques will be available from March 11 to 13 for any physical extractions. For instance, any cheques which have an out-of-country address are extracted and then arrangements are made for these cheques to be deposited to a banking institution, as authorized by the recipient.

The mailing of the cheques, to commence on March 16, 1981 at the rate of approximately 24,000 per day, will be completed by March 30, 1981.

The total cheques are in excess of one quarter of a million—some 262,000. The majority, almost 164,000 are for wheat; 59,000 are for feed barley; 34,000 are for Durum, and 5,000 are for designated barley (selected).

Given the magnitude of the task, the Canadian Wheat Board has processed this complete transaction in some 30 working days. I am informed that that is one working day less this year than the similar process took the previous year.

In the meantime, while the cheques are going into the mails, producers should realize that all of their monies in the hands of the Canadian Wheat Board are earning interest at the rate of some 17 per cent per annum.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

ROYAL COMMISSION ON NEWSPAPERS

Hon. Robert Muir: I am sure all honourable senators are very interested in that comprehensive reply, since this subject is very important to the people involved. It was very good of the minister to relay that information, and I think it was a very good answer.

Along the same lines, could the minister advise this chamber, here and now, how much money has been spent by the Kent Commission up to 8.45 this evening? Could he also advise how many sittings that commission has had and where they were held? I know the minister has this up-to-date information in the back of his mind.

[Senator Argue.]

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): I shall take the question as notice and attempt to provide the honourable senator with as comprehensive a reply as I have given to the previous question. However, I do not understand why the question is directed to me, but I will do what I can.

Senator Muir: I would make the comment that I directed the question to the honourable minister because he has very kindly offered to reply. Unlike his seatmate, he does not become irritable; he does not become cantankerous; he does not bluster through his beard so that we cannot understand him; and he does not mumble into the microphone so that only Hansard reporters can understand what is being said and senators must wait to read Hansard to understand what was said and do not have a chance to respond immediately. The honourable minister who has just resumed his seat is to be commended for giving good replies.

ENERGY

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—CARRIED INTEREST EXEMPTION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Roblin on January 28 regarding carried interest exemption and the National Energy Program.

The honourable senator had asked whether the government had any intentions of exempting certain areas in Canada Lands from the 25 per cent carried interest. The 25 per cent will not apply to fields which were in production prior to January 1, 1976, as is stated explicitly in Bill C-48, the Canada Oil and Gas Act. Hence, for example, it would not apply to the field at Norman Wells.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Doody on December 9, 1980, concerning fiscal arrangements.

I am informed that the major components of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977, are the Fiscal Equalization Program, the Tax Collection Agreements, and the Established Programs Financing Arrangements. These programs, in addition to the Canada Assistance Plan, will be reviewed by a recently established Parliamentary Task Force.

The current five-year fiscal arrangements period comes to an end on March 31, 1982. The existing arrangements will be reviewed with the provinces prior to that date.

UNEMPLOYMENT

COMPILATION OF STATISTICS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on December 9, 1980, in response to a question from Senator Smith, I undertook to bring a supplementary statement to the Senate concerning the measurement of unemployment and the continuing efforts which are made to ensure the accuracy of the statistics.

I have been advised that Canada's official estimates of employment and unemployment are derived from the Labour Force Survey conducted monthly by Statistics Canada. Since its inception in 1945, this survey has been subject to continuous evaluation and improvement. In fact, the measures of employment and unemployment currently in use are the product of an in-depth review which culminated in 1975 with the introduction of a substantially revised survey which was created expressly to service the stated requirements of federal, provincial and other data users. The fact that the equivalent survey in the United States is about to adopt a number of techniques developed for the Canadian Labour Force Survey testifies to the excellence of what has been achieved. The design of the survey was also commended in the assessment of Statistics Canada's methodologies completed last year by an international team of experts headed by Sir Claus Moser.

The Labour Force Survey's definition of unemployment is based primarily on the presence of active job search, and it should be noted that job search is very broadly measured. For example, anyone without a job who has looked at job advertisements in the newspaper at any time during the previous four weeks would usually be counted as unemployed. The current definition of unemployment has been shown to be conceptually and operationally sound, and it is consistent with standards prescribed by international agencies such as the United Nations. It is also comparable to practices in most western industrialized countries.

No single definition however, can provide a complete picture of employment and unemployment, and in order to enable a better understanding of Canada's labour markets, Statistics Canada publishes a wide range of information underlying the summary data. The agency also conducts a number of supplementary surveys focusing on movements into and out of the labour force. As a result, the statistics available to assess labour market conditions in Canada are extremely comprehensive and informative.

In summary, while no survey can yield measures of employment and unemployment with absolute precision, we can take satisfaction from the knowledge that Statistics Canada is a recognized world leader in designing and carrying out such surveys, and that the agency strives continuously to ensure the accuracy and relevance of its labour force statistics.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to some questions asked by Honourable Senators Molgat and Roblin on February 12, 1981, and other occasions recently, concerning the Garrison diversion project.

In response to the questions raised by the honourable senators, I wish to report that the Secretary of State for External Affairs did take the opportunity of his meeting with the U.S. Secretary of State, General Haig, to raise the subject of the Garrison diversion project. Dr. MacGuigan noted the previous commitment of the U.S. government to honour its obligations under the Boundary Waters Treaty and remarked on the past co-operation of U.S. administrations. The subject was raised in order to express the serious nature of Canadian concern; however, there was no detailed discussion, and no new assurances were either sought or given. As the Prime Minister stated in the House of Commons on January 21, and again on February 18, he will be discussing the Garrison project with President Reagan during his visit to Canada.

As the Honourable Senator Roblin pointed out, on January 21 to 23 Canadian scientific and technical experts visited the U.S. Water and Power Resources Services Engineering and Research Center in Denver, Colorado, to receive a briefing on the most recent U.S. technical design modifications to the Garrison project. It is not planned to issue reports as a result of this meeting. Its purpose was to ensure that upcoming bilateral consultations are based on a firm understanding of the technical issues involved. The information gained will form one component of an overall presentation of the Canadian position at these consultations.

EAST COAST FISHERIES AND MARITIME BOUNDARY TREATIES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Asselin on February 12 concerning the East Coast Fisheries and Maritime Boundary Treaties.

The East Coast Fisheries and Maritime Boundary Treaties were signed March 29, 1979, in Washington by Secretary of State Vance and Canadian Ambassador Towe.

Secretary of State Haig assured the Secretary of State for External Affairs on January 30, 1981, in Washington that the new administration stood by the treaties and would continue to seek Senate consent to their ratification.

THE CONSTITUTION

AMENDMENTS PROPOSED BY WOMEN'S CONFERENCE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Asselin on February 17 concerning constitutional amendments proposed by the Women's Conference.

The Right Honourable the Prime Minister stated in the other place that the amendments proposed "are probably very sensitive and worthwhile additions", and that if they are moved in the house the government will "see if they are an improvement to the resolution or not" and will make its judgment in consequence.

There are two further points that may be of interest to the honourable senator. The first is a quotation from Doris Anderson regarding the amendments made to section 15:

> I think the government's come a very long way toward meeting the concerns of Canadians, especially women.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You should have quoted her when she spoke about a statement by the Minister of Justice.

Senator Perrault: The second point is that the Progressive Conservative Party, which professes such interest in women's issues, voted against all but two of the amendments proposed by the Women's Conference when they were advanced before the Constitution Committee.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to the question asked by Senator Guay on February 18 last concerning the Garrison Dam project.

Canadian scientific and technical experts met with their American counterparts at the Water and Power Resources Service Engineering and Research Center in Colorado from January 21 to 23.

The meeting was of a technical nature in order to provide us with data for upcoming meetings with the Americans. The Americans showed us some technical innovations, but these did not fully meet our concerns. We thus remain with our previous position that we want an ironclad guarantee that there will be no interbasin transfer of biota.

As for the second part of the honourable senator's question, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister has stated he intends to raise the matter with President Reagan when he visits Canada in March.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—PRODUCTION OF IRISH MOSS

Question No. 12 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Heath Macquarrie:

> 1. What was (a) the total volume, and (b) the total value of Irish moss landings in each of the Atlantic provinces for the last ten fiscal years?
> 2. What assistance has the Government of Canada rendered towards the establishment of a carageen extraction plant in Prince Edward Island?
> 3. In what countries from 1969 to 1979 has Irish moss from Atlantic Canada been processed?
> 4. What was the value of such product?
> 5. What groups or individuals have requested Canadian government assistance in the construction of a carageen extraction plant in the Atlantic provinces?

Reply by the President of the Privy Council:

[Senator Perrault.]

I am informed by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and Statistics Canada as follows:

> 1. This information is confidential, since it identifies individual respondents.
> 2. On June 23, 1980, DREE announced that Island Resources Ltd. of Tignish, Prince Edward Island had accepted an RDIA offer of $195,333 towards the construction of a carageen plant on P.E.I.
> 3. This information is not available, since data on country of processing is not collected.
> 4. This information is confidential, since it identifies individual respondents.
> 5. Applications for incentives under the Regional Development Incentives Program, and related documentation, contain commercially confidential information related to business investment decisions. It is for this reason that the Department does not make public the fact that an application has been received, or the details of that application until an offer of incentive assistance has been accepted.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

THE CONSTITUTION—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—PROPOSAL THAT RESUMPTION OF DEBATE BE FIRST ORDER OF THE DAY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we proceed with Orders of the Day I should like to say that we on this side have had discussions with the Leader of the Opposition regarding the method by which we should deal with the Address on the Constitution resolution. One of the matters we discussed is the possibility of this being the first item on the Orders of the Day each day. Senator Roblin has told me that he feels it is a government matter and, therefore, that it can take whatever position the government wishes it to take on the Orders of the Day.

Rule 21 sets out the sequence for there is a set Orders of the Day, and requires third readings of bills to come first. I suggest we make it an order of the Senate that the debate on the Address respecting the Constitution be the first item on the Orders of the Day each day until the matter is disposed of. We can then deal with this important matter subject to that priority. I showed Senator Roblin a wording that would so provide and, therefore, I move:

> That it be ordered that notwithstanding rule 21 the Order of the Day to resume the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada, be the first Order of the Day until the motion is finally disposed of.

I should say that there may be occasions, of course, when we will want to change that for special reasons, but it seems that we have agreed that the resumption of the debate on the Address respecting the Constitution be the first Order of the Day until it is disposed of.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I am a little unhappy about the motion, because this debate will go on at great length, whereas the third reading of a bill is normally a quick and speedy matter. Personally, I happen to be interested in Bill S-17, the Income Tax Conventions bill. There are interests in Canada that are concerned in getting that bill passed and I would hope that it would not have to wait day after day for a long debate on the constitutional issue. I cannot see why the third readings of bills might not be first. They rarely involve debate for more than a few minutes.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as I have said, there could always be an exception. I am suggesting that we proceed in the manner I have suggested with regard to this resolution, and if there is an occasion when someone wishes the third reading of a bill to come first, I am sure that, with leave, we can agree that that be so.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I do not wish to make any objection, but I note that the first Order of the Day for this date is a third reading that stands in my name, and I would be happy, with the consent of the house, to postpone it for this day. That might give all concerned an opportunity to think about the general proposition, and expedite the debate tonight.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like an opportunity to consider this matter overnight. The honourable senator has correctly quoted the substance of what I said to him. It is my opinion that the government controls Orders of the Day, once government orders have been reached, and can call them in the order they prefer. I hope that opinion is correct, but I would like an opportunity to verify it before proceeding further.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—THIRD READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C., for the third reading of the Bill S-15, intituled: "An Act respecting The Royal Canadian Legion".—(Honourable Senator Smith).

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, in line with what I said a moment ago, I am quite prepared, indeed, I desire, to postpone this order until after the adjournment of today's debate on the Constitution. If it is not too late, I will then ask permission to speak on third reading of Bill S-15.

Order stands.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 19, the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, do we all have enough courage to tackle this question so late this evening? I hope that the vitality which was obvious in the exchanges since the opening of the sitting will be of great assistance and help you listen to the statement I am about to make and which may be rather lengthy. In any event if everyone agrees I might simply stop around ten o'clock or 10.15 and continue tomorrow. In any case I imagine you will not hold it against me if I spare you a rhetorical introduction to the comments I intend to make. Let us get directly to the point.

My comments on the proposed resolution before us will focus on four themes. The first theme, the work of the committee which improved the resolution, but in fact it has remained essentially as it was in October. The second theme, the arguments of the government and the opposing views. Third, I will dwell on the growing opposition since October 2 and the emergence of new deadlocks. Finally, to break those deadlocks, I will recall the alternative proposals made to the committee by the Progressive Conservative Party. I will conclude by describing the choice we have to make between two concepts of the federation and its future.

As regards the first theme, during and after the work of the joint committee what happened to the resolution of October 2 which we referred to it for study last fall?

To what extent has it been changed more or less by the amendments made to it?

According to its report the committee finally adopted 67 amendments altogether: 58 of the 58 proposed by the government, 7 of the 22 moved by the Progressive Conservative Party, and 2 of the 42 from the New Democratic Party.

On which part of the resolution did most of the amendments bear?

Setting aside 10-odd strictly technical amendments, the remaining 57 basic amendments are divided as follows among the various parts of the resolution: the Charter of Rights, 35 amendments: equalization and natural resources, respectively 1 and 2 amendments; the constitutional conference, 2; the amendment procedures, 14; the general provisions, the last part of the resolution, only one amendment; and the schedule to the Constitution Act, 1981, 2 amendments.

I think these statistics are revealing, showing as they do that most of the amendments had to do with the Charter of Rights and the amendment procedures. I think that such concentration does not reflect only what I would call openness or accommodation on the part of the government with regard to the various amendments possible. At the same time they reveal, perhaps by coincidence, what was expressed in committee. They reveal the interest shown by the witnesses who appeared before the committee.

There is no need to say that these basic amendments did not have equal significance. There is no need to say either that different value judgments can be made on their more or less substantial character.

In that respect I have no intention of analyzing the amendments related to the Charter of Rights, or other fundamental constitutional changes.

In all fairness, it should be noted in passing that the Charter of Rights came out of committee much better than it was when it went in. Also, the inclusion in the Constitution of the equalization principle and of provisions on natural resources are important and valid constitutional amendments.

Since we proposed in committee that such changes be part of the normal post-patriation constitutional amendment process, we should not at this stage discuss the basic quality of the proposals contained in the government's package.

Rather, I will consider the changes made to the amending procedures.

Are we in fact dealing with substantive amendments?

The following changes to parts four and five dealing with procedures seem to me to be of some significance.

Under section 38, for example, which became section 42, seven instead of eight provinces can get together to submit their own proposal in view of a referendum to decide between the federal and the provincial formulae. However, the combined population of these provinces must still make up at least eighty per cent of the total population.

As for the federal formula, the Victoria formula presumably, the two maritime provinces which could veto a proposed amendment, do not have to represent 50 per cent of the total population of the area, however this requirement remains in effect for the western provinces.

As for the referendum, both in the interim period and for the permanent procedure, a Referendum Rules Commission was proposed in amendment. The provinces will be represented collectively on that Commission by one person out of three appointed on the recommendation of the governments of the majority of the provinces. The suggestions made by the Commission on the rules applicable to the holding of a referendum are not final however. The final decision will rest with Parliament which will continue to legislate on the holding of a referendum.

A period of reflection of one year, a cooling-off period as it is called, is provided for referendums used as deadlock-breaking mechanisms, between the time Parliament passes a resolution authorizing an amendment to the Constitution of Canada and the time the Governor in Council authorizes by proclamation that a referendum be held.

[Senator Tremblay.]

A new amending formula was added to the one provided for in the proposal to allow a province, with the consent of Parliament, to apply all or part of the official languages provisions. Incidentally this is a proposal we made but which the government adapted to its own views. Our proposal required only the decision of the province, whereas the amendment also requires Parliament's consent before a province is free to "opt-in". The way in which the amendment was formulated has changed what we considered a pure and simple freedom for the provinces to join in into a sort of controlled and limited freedom.

Curiously enough, and perhaps with a bit of procedural humour, if such a thing is possible, it is because of the previous amendment that the Senate was spared, since it is to section 44 of the initial proposal that the previous amendment was moved by the Minister of Justice. After the new section 44 was passed, it only remained to say, and the minister did so with a smile, that the previous section 44 concerning the Senate had been deleted automatically. There was therefore no positive gesture of salvation of the Senate, but rather a saving omission.

In my opinion, these are the only significant changes made to the proposal. For my part, I do not consider that they change its substance.

All things considered, the February 13 version of the government proposal is essentially similar to the October 2 version.

The substance of the government proposal remains the same. The proposal is unchanged in several respects. It is still exclusively a proposal of the Canadian Parliament. It still includes radical substantive changes to the Constitution, from the Charter of Rights to the amendment to the British North America Act of 1867 relating to natural resources; the rule of unanimity as a temporary amendment formula is also there, and so is the Victoria formula as a permanent amending formula prepared by the government to amend the Constitution. The proposal still provides for a referendum to break any deadlock on the selection of a permanent amending formula. Finally, the referendum has been retained as a permanent mechanism to amend the Constitution in the future. All in all, the government proposal remains essentially the same in its more questionable aspects.

Since the government proposal has remained the same for all practical purposes, no one should be surprised that the arguments invoked in support of it have not changed so much, no more, I must admit, than the arguments against it. In this regard, both proponents and opponents of the resolution are in the same boat as we have had to repeat ourselves more often than not these last few months, and I think that my contribution this evening does not escape this common fate. In any event, I have tried to bring down to seven the major arguments for and against the government proposal. However, I do not claim to have done justice to all of them. In fact, I have mentioned them only as a reminder, since the rest of the debate will probably provide us with the opportunity to look fully into them and put them in their proper perspective. In fact, in view of the late hour, I am not certain that I shall review them all.

However, I want to say a few words about the first one.

The first argument would read something like this: We now have a constitutional amending procedure which does not require the unanimous consent of the provinces, but only the vote of a simple majority of the members of both houses of the Canadian Parliament. The Canadian Parliament should not retain this unlimited power to amend by itself the Constitution of Canada.

I quite agree that the Canadian Parliament should not retain the unlimited authority to amend the Constitution of Canada on its own, if however such an authority does exist—

It may be that in strictly legal terms Parliament is invested with such an authority. There is some uncertainty, however, as indicated in the judgment of the Manitoba Appeal Court.

The situation is far from clear when one analyses its legal aspects as was done last fall by Senator Flynn, well before the Kershaw report endorsed his theory. According to him, since 1931 and 1949, the British Parliament is the guardian in trust of the Canadian federative system.

But let us leave it to the courts to finally settle the matter, which is strictly legal.

Let us keep in mind, however, that for the past 50 years, the federal Parliament has always ensured that a constitutional amendment relating to jurisdictional matters be previously subject to provincial assent before going through the required formal and legal procedure with the Parliament in Westminster.

A second argument deals with the half-century of attempts to agree on an amending formula. One half-century of useless attempts. It is time to act and to break the deadlock. That is called the "deadlock-breaking mechanism" concept.

Senator Flynn: That hang-up!

Senator Tremblay: This, I suggest, is an obvious case of rebuilding the past from one's perception of the present. A very conventional approach indeed with which a great historian, Professor Marrow, deals at length in his book entitled "On Historical Knowledge."

It is indeed an historical make-up from a reading of the past designed to illustrate one theory, that of the multiple deadlocks, to justify the action one has decided to take, and which is mainly based on a new concept of federal relations in Canada, the "deadlock-breaking mechanism" concept, to use the author's own words.

Canadians are well aware that the constitutional history of Canada is not limited to such a simplistic and biased reading.

Third point: The deadlock is ascribed to the provinces which have no sense of the national interests but solely of their own interests. The national Parliament alone and not a community of communities as a league of provinces can look after, examine, negotiate and secure Canadian interests.

My answer to that point is simple: This is an anti-federal and fundamentally centralist argument. In short, in a federation the national interests are defined on a power-sharing basis. I will only quote two examples: education, for instance, is assigned to the provinces under our Constitution. Is education not a matter of national interest? This is not the reason why it was left with the provinces. The assignment of education was consistent with the Canadian reality which required that the provinces themselves be responsible for such a nationwide problem. Moreover, throughout the years they have made sure that the required co-ordination exists at the national level to solve the national aspects of the educational problem. The provinces eventually came up with the Board of the Ministers of Education which has now been operating for almost 20 years.

The question of civil rights is another example. And this is the example used for the so-called checkerboard, a pattern of Common Law and Civil Code which originally were clearly seen as coming under the jurisdiction of the provinces, more specifically to coincide with the reality of the Canadian fabric.

In short, the sharing of jurisdictions means that national interests are best served by assigning legislative authority to the provinces in certain matters. They are also best served in other matters when that jurisdiction belongs to the central Parliament.

Consequently, it would seem wrong, to say the least, were the national Parliament to be the only authority to be involved in the national interests of the Canadian people within a federal system. The two levels of government are responsible for those nationwide interests.

A fourth argument deals with the Charter of Rights and freedoms. Canadians as a whole want a Charter of Rights and freedoms. The only way to get it is to include it in the patriation package. Otherwise, we will never get it, because the provinces do not want it.

Let us forget how odious the provinces must find such an argument, where federal officials state bluntly that it is indeed justified to call on Westminster, in order to overcome the provinces' opposition to such an important document which will affect them very deeply.

But, on top of everything, I suggest that we should not speak as though there were no Bill of Rights now in Canada. As a matter of fact, each level of government has one. On the federal level, we have the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights, and on the provincial level, we have in each and every province a more or less elaborate one. These charters however, are ordinary laws enacted by legislature.

The idea here is to move up from parliamentary charters to a "Constitutional Charter".

We agree in principle on the need for such a movement. But the Constitutional Charter should not repeal the others. On the contrary, it should harmonize them. What will happen to the existing charters, both federal and provincial once the proposed charter is finally adopted by the British Parliament in London? Will the preamble, for instance, aid the enjoyment of property which can be found in Mr. Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights and which has been rejected by the Committee, disappear from the federal statutes? Will the federal and provincial governments take the necessary steps to adjust their respective charters in line with the charter imported from London? It is quite clear that the federal and provincial governments will find it appropriate to wait until the courts have passed judgment on specific cases to decide what they are to retain or eliminate from their respective charters, taking into account the existence of a constitutional charter.

All things considered, however, it seems to me that the most critical question we have to ask ourselves is this: setting aside all demagogy, is it preferable in the very interest of those whose rights and freedoms we would guarantee and protect in the fields of jurisdiction of both the federal government and its provincial counterparts; is it preferable to impose now, unilaterally, a constitutional Charter of Rights and Freedoms without prior approval between the two levels of government; is it preferable to impose now and unilaterally the Charter of Rights and Freedoms drawn up in committee under the working conditions we know? I am not underestimating the quality of the efforts our committee made to improve the proposed charter in the light of the testimony it heard.

But, if life and experience have taught us anything, I am sure it is that maturity and growth cannot be forced upon either men or any living things. One does not make a tree grow faster by tugging at its branches. The principle of its growth is found in its roots.

The same can be said about real and effective protection of rights and freedoms. It has its roots in living communities. Of course, it must blossom out in a constitutional charter. However, if we pull at it too quickly and too hard through the Constitution, we take the risks of uprooting it. In view of these major risks, I do not for my part see anything tragic in reestablishing in the normal growth process of our federation the development and application of a constitutional Charter of Rights and Freedoms based on the roots it already has at both levels of governments, in the 11 existing parliamentary charters.

A fifth argument which has been repeated very often, I believe, is that the important thing is not the process itself, but the substance of the proposal.

This argument is more than specious. In a federative system defined by a sharing of jurisdiction and powers by both levels of government and by the relationships between these two levels, the process is the substance of the system itself.

In fact, this is always true in a democratic system if not in other systems. Is the democratic choice of those who exercise power on behalf of the people and for the people anything else than a process? Yet, the substance is not to be found in the democratic election of political leaders, but rather in the contents of parliamentary legislation. Should we then say that elections are not important in a democratic system because the substance is the legislation? In certain areas, substance and process become one.

A sixth argument is that the present proposal does not provide for any change in the distribution of powers. This is so obvious that I shall forego any detailed explanation, even a brief one. However, I do not want to skip a seventh argument.

This is only a beginning, a good beginning! Afterwards, we shall undertake a true renewal of the Constitution. No one would have wished Parliament to act unilaterally. Circumstances have brought this about. It is only a bad time to go through, and afterwards everything will return to normal in order and harmony.

Obviously, this appeasing argument has been inspired by the increasing opposition to the government proposal in the last few months. The government was a bit more confident in early October when it believed that the opposition of the provinces would melt away! In fact, this argument reminds me of the divorce and remarriage argument which was served under various forms to oppose sovereignty association during the referendum campaign. I suggest to Mr. Chrétien and the other Quebec members of Parliament that they should read their own statements on this theme. They are as valid mutatis mutandis in the present situation. The divorce between the federal government and the provinces could not be more obvious. Remarriage in happy harmony after implementation of the government proposal will not be any easier than remarriage of the association would have been after the divorce of the Quebec sovereignty.

On reflection, I wonder if most of the arguments that we gave Quebecers to oppose sovereignty association and support federalism during the referendum campaign cannot be transported nearly theme for theme to support federalism and oppose the present government proposal.

Such are, roughly summarized, the main arguments in support of the government proposals and the replies, also roughly summarized, I admit, that we can give to these arguments.

In any case, all these arguments for and against the proposal must not make us forget a very important phenomenon which has occurred since the fall and which, I hope, is certainly not irrelevant to the argumentation itself, but which has transcended the committee and the parliamentary circle to involve the outside world. I referred to this phenomenon earlier when I spoke about increasing opposition and the emergence of new deadlocks.

It is now past 10 o'clock, and I maintain my previous offer, honourable senators, unless you have the necessary stamina. I am just about half way through. I warn you, honourable senators, that you will have to be patient.

Let us look at the opposition which has built up since October and the emergence of new deadlocks. I do not intend to try to determine whether or not there was any true deadlock at the September conference.

We have two official versions in that respect—one by the Prime Minister of Canada, the other by the chairman of the provincial premiers conference. What is of significance for the subsequent events is that the Prime Minister concluded that there was indeed a deadlock and decided to act the way he did. The interesting point is that his decision and the ensuing proposal then became the starting point of a series of reactions, the scope and consistency of which the Prime Minister himself may not have envisaged.

Having dramatized, in order to create a deadlock, the difficulties normally encountered in a conference such as the one held in September, considering the circumstances, having dramatized the September deadlock to make it the consequence of all previous failures, each confirming the others, he chose to proceed in such a way that he himself created and produced new deadlocks: first, a deadlock as between the national government and the Canadian community, reflecting rising opposition to the proposal from October 2nd onwards. And second, a deadlock, still latent but quite possible between the Canadian Parliament and Westminster.

The rising opposition is so obvious that I need not dwell on it. Let me say a few words however on the possible deadlock between the Canadian and British Parliaments. Maybe in this case "dilemma" would be a better term than "deadlock". The question is not whether the British Parliament should or should not rubber-stamp a request from the Canadian Parliament to amend the Constitution. The fact is that the Canadian Parliament has not done that over these last 50 years without first securing provincial agreement, where the relevant amendment implied a sharing of jurisdiction.

What is unheard of in the government proposal is that they want to ask Westminster to rubberstamp the proposal despite the substantial changes it would introduce into the Canadian federal system.

It is such an unusual scheme that the British Parliament has some reservations about it. For the moment, they are only pondering. Let us hope that the Canadian government will not change their reluctance into true dilemma or deadlock.

Fourth and last, how can we break out of those deadlocks we have created over the last few months? One way out has been to propose amendments in committee. We have tried to suggest a legitimate and positive alternative to the government's proposal which would retain the basic objectives, but discard unacceptable elements involving both the process and the substance. The project embodies three basic objectives. First, to patriate the Canadian Constitution. Second, to allow the Canadian federation to amend its Constitution. Third, to entrench a Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and various major changes into the Constitution.

As far as those objectives are concerned, at no time have we questioned their real value. We have recognized them as valuable and necessary. But right from the beginning, we have objected to the procedure the government intends to follow to reach its goal, as most Canadian provinces representing a majority of the Canadian people and a great number of Canadians have expressed their disapproval.

As I said earlier, they cannot say that the process is not an important matter in this case. To the contrary, the approach and process are important when they substantially alter and affect the basis and very nature of our federal system.

A few days ago, Mr. Chrétien said that nobody, including himself I suppose, understood our proposal, but it all seems to me very simple.

• (2150)

Our proposal asks London to do what it should do. But nothing more. We are not asking London to make on our behalf substantive changes to our Constitution which should be made in Canada through the amending formula agreed to between the two levels of government.

We are asking London to do only three things. First, to repeal section 7(1) of the Statute of Westminster. That is decolonization, the removal of the last colonial link binding Canada to Great Britain, the patriation of the Constitution.

Second, to entrench as a temporary amending formula the rule under which amendments to the Constitution affecting power sharing and especially the jurisdictions, the rights and privileges of the provinces could only be made with the consent of Parliament and all provincial legislatures: it is the rule of unanimity.

Third, to define and legalize the process through which the Canadian federation will give itself, after patriation, an amending formula in keeping with the federative character of our country.

That is the gist of our proposal. On the first two points, there is no difference between the government's proposal and ours: they both repeal section 7(1) of the Statute of Westminster, and they both maintain on a temporary basis the rule of unanimity as the amending formula.

It is in connection with the third point that they show major differences, while nevertheless showing some similarities.

What are those differences, and what are those similarities?

Such are the questions on which the Minister of Justice has been requesting further information, for he claims he is unable to understand our approach.

Let us ignore the amending formulas provided for under sections 47, 51, 52, 54 which do not cause any difficulties.

What is there that remains in the government's project concerning the search for and the development of permanent amending formulas which would finally replace the rule of unanimity?

First, there is the fact, and it is essential, that the proposed resolution provides not only for one but two permanent amending formulas. The first is the one contained in section 46. According to this formula, in case of a deadlock between the federal government and the provinces over a proposed amendment, Parliament will be in a position to get its own proposal approved by way of a unilateral referendum even against the wishes of the provinces. With regard to this formula we have expressed our unequivocal disagreement. Section 46 and all that goes with it should simply be deleted from the proposed resolution. We categorically reject this type of amending formula for the reasons that we have often stated.

This being said, let us now deal with the process through which it is proposed to come to an allegedly more normal and less exceptional formula. The government proposal is quite complex in that respect. It places us at least before the following possibilities. Firstly, there could be some kind of formula the content of which could be quite unusual provided it has been unanimously agreed to over the two year period following the enactment of the Constitution Act, 1981.

Secondly, it could be the formula contained in section 45, namely the Victoria formula such as it stands or amended if the provinces do not come up with a substitute formula during that two year period. In passing, let us underline that the Victoria formula of October 2 has been amended in committee. It could again be amended as was clearly indicated by the minister.

We are not therefore dealing with a finished product. In that regard the Victoria formula rates on the same basis as the Vancouver formula.

Thirdly, if the provinces do offer a substitute formula in the two following years, that is to say at the latest some four years after the enactment of the legislation, a referendum would be used to choose between the federally sponsored or provincially sponsored formula. Six months later the Governor General would proclaim the formula chosen by the people.

That is how, honourable senators, and within which time frame, the Canadian federation will finally give itself a permanent and normal amending formula according to the proposal of the government. Shall we all agree to it? Is the procedure simple, clear, specific? All things considered, supposing the government proposal runs its course and the British Parliament sends us our Constitution sometime during 1981, this year, we would finally have an amending formula in the year of grace 1986 or thereabout! Until then, we would live under the unanimity system.

In relation to the government proposal, how did ours compare, which was submitted to the committee where it was turned down without real discussion or dialogue because of the constraints in time and procedure within which the committee found itself constantly bound?

● (2200)

Let us remember that we first proposed that the charter be rerouted through the standard Canadian federal procedures, that it might be adopted jointly by both levels of government through the use of the amending formula agreed upon by those same levels of government. That motion was defeated in committee.

. We also proposed to substitute the Vancouver formula for the Victoria formula. The motion was defeated.

We finally proposed to delete section 42 from the initial proposal, which became section 46 in this proposal. The motion was defeated.

According to the established procedure, all the conclusions had been drawn as far as the Constitution Act, 1981 was concerned. Within the committee, the substance of that fundamental legislation could no longer be changed, and it would come out of the committee without any other change.

[Senator Tremblay.]

How could we have all our proposals reinserted so that the essential of our approach be respected, even on the assumption that the whole government resolution would end up at Westminster?

Only one way remained open: to split the process itself into two stages and carry out the operation from the British legislation itself: on the one hand by distinguishing between the coming into force of the British act and the coming into force of the Constitution Act, 1981, something which the government resolution does in some way; on the other hand, by including in the British act, and therefore making them the law in Canada, the conditions under which the provisions of the Constitution Act, 1981, will come into force.

In so doing, our amendment to the British act had those exact results:

First, it deferred all substantial changes to the Constitution that remained in the Constitution Act, 1981, until an amending formula was agreed to.

Second, it provided that such changes would be brought about through that amending formula.

Third, the search for an amending formula had a one year time limit after which the matter would have to be settled.

Fourth, it stated that the consensus to be reached on an amending formula should always be approved by the federal government, but that a decreasing number of provinces, could be involved, from all of them to a majority of seven representing a majority of the Canadian population, which amounts to the majority required in the Vancouver formula.

Fifth, supposing that at the end of the year, the first ministers conference would fail, either because of the federal position or because of the provincial stand, to agree on an amending formula, with respect to the minimum consensus required, then our proposal would come to this conclusion: the state of the country, the state of intergovernmental relationships and reflections have not reached the level of maturity required to have a viable and acceptable formula. Therefore, the proposal provided for a return to the unanimity rule, rather than for having a referendum.

That is the overall alternative which we submitted to the committee, and which was rejected by a majority vote. Is it that difficult to understand?

For the minister to tell us that he does not agree with that approach, I can understand that. But for him to state that it is not understood by anyone, including himself, I can hardly understand it. I am convinced, on the contrary, that he did understand it very well. He understood very well that it went to the heart of the matter, that it was a true alternative to the government proposal, and that it would pass all Canadian stages and would go before the Parliament of Westminster.

Surely Mr. Chrétien has understood that our amendment to the British bill brings back to Canada all the effective and real decision-making processes related to the fundamental changes to the Canadian Constitution.

Surely he has understood that the amending formula we need for the future ought to be the object of consensus in Canada between the two levels of government without any recourse to the referendum.

Surely he has understood that between recourse to the referendum in case of a deadlock and a return to unanimity we would much rather have unanimity because it is a lesser evil than a referendum where the people would have to decide between two levels of government, a referendum which would force Canadians to choose between two equally legitimate allegiances in a context where, by definition, they would be pitted one against the other.

Fifth, surely he has understood that the stages provided for in our proposals—first try to secure unanimity, then accept a majority of eight provinces representing 80 per cent of the population, and finally go with a majority of seven provinces including 50 per cent of the population—would gradually do away with the veto of the most densely populated provinces.

Sixth, surely he has understood that the impending possibility of a progressive disappearance of the veto of certain provinces would improve the chances of achieving the required majority among the provinces under the Vancouver formula.

Finally, surely he has understood that in a way our formula was forcing the federal government to be the only one to object to the Vancouver formula and that if we were forced to seek unanimity it would be because of the federal veto, not that of the provinces.

In short, Mr. Chrétien has understood everything. He has understood very well that our proposal amounts to a genuine and authentic alternative to the government's resolution.

In the first place our proposal gives the central government itself the possibility of breaking out of the deadlocks in which its unilateral action and its own marginal transactions have trapped it.

Secondly, our proposal enables the provincial governments to break the deadlock where they also ended up by negotiating patriation with substantive changes to the Canadian Constitution.

Thirdly, our proposal enables the Canadian people to reconcile their legitimate allegiances to both orders of government without having to resort to the phoney and hazardous arbitration of a referendum.

Finally, our proposal saves everyone in Canada the humiliation of making a foreign government the arbitrator of our proceedings and internal conflicts.

The other day, Senator Austin pointed out that we had experienced a historic moment. I readily agree that the proposal before is of historic importance in the evolution of the Canadian federation and that it will change the course of that evolution if it is ever implemented.

I am concerned, however, about the direction in which he will guide it if it is finally adopted by the Canadian Parliament and if it comes back from London without any major amendments.

It is not enough to change the course of history. One has yet to know in which direction the change will be brought about before rejoicing and hoisting the flags.

In this case, what is proposed to us is certainly nothing to make a song and dance about. On the contrary, the project before us would rather call for a black milestone to mark the turn the Canadian federation would take with this government project.

The Minister of Justice stated repeatedly that after the projected operation, things would not be the same again.

Of course, they will not be the same. We will no longer be in a federal system with two levels of government being equal. Originally, 114 years ago, equality might not have existed in strict legal terms, but an equality was set up in fact, in the light of laboriously acquired experience, with the economic, social and cultural changes which have taken place in the Canadian context. On the contrary, ours will be a system in which one level of government will clearly dominate the other, a system in which the Canadian Parliament will dominate the provincial legislatures, a system which will be established and hallowed once and for all in all respects, notwithstanding the sharing of jurisdictions and sovereignty equal on both sides, according to these jurisdictions, which are the essential characteristics of a true federal system.

That is the heart of the problem, the option the Canadian federation always has had to face from the beginning, and which the government project forces us to face more crucially than ever before. Either the federal will dominate the provinces; or the provinces will dominate the federal government; or there will be a balance between the two levels of government.

Some people are all for the absolute dominance of the federal government over the provinces; others intend more or less consciously, more or less openly, to establish the supremacy of the provinces over the federal. As far as I am concerned, I advocate a balance between the two levels of government.

"The total is greater than the sum of its parts," we are told, and that is what is used to justify the preponderence of the federal government over the provinces.

We hear this fallacy repeated so often that a brief word about it is in order to show how false it actually is.

I am almost through. Please be patient.

Senator Frith: We are listening, not only patiently but with great interest.

Senator Tremblay: Thank you for such courtesy, my dear colleague.

Of course the total is greater than the sum of its parts. That is a truism.

But that has nothing to do with the kind of totality involved in a federation.

Where is the "total" in a federation, and where are the "parts"?

The "federative total" is found neither in the central government or institutions nor in the decentralized legislatures or institutions. The "federative total" is found in the federation itself of which the centralized as well as the decentralized institutions are parts.

Therefore if we opposed the centralized and the decentralized authorities, as I intended to do last week, we are opposing the parts as distinct from the "total" of the federation in which they are combined and of which they form an integral part.

Consequently if more importance is given to the federal than to the provinces, this is not to say that more importance is given to the "federative total" but rather to one part over another.

This truism is self-evident if one considers the formula of the "total greater than the sum of its parts" in a federative context.

It is also a truism to define the federative problem as being one of opposition between a strong central government and weak provinces or of a weak central government and strong provinces.

It is not the provinces that should be stronger than the federal government or vice versa, but rather the federation itself which should be stronger than either one. The antidote to separatism is to be found in the overwhelming force, lying not with the federal government nor with the provinces but with the federation, in the reconciliation of the jurisdictions, the federal and the provincial.

The force of the "federated whole" lies not in the forces of the jurisdictions pitted one against the other, but in the will of all, both federal and provincial, to recognize themselves as components of the whole and to act accordingly.

The proposal now before us institutes the absolute preponderance of the federal jurisdiction over the provincial jurisdictions. This is where it is fundamentally unacceptable because it destroys the concept of the "federated whole".

Such is the background before which this debate is set and which reveals its true significance.

We have to choose between two concepts of the Canadian federation and its future, two concepts advocated by two Canadian Prime Ministers—the Prime Minister now in office, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, and the Prime Minister who preceded and will succeed him, the Right Honourable Joe Clark. And between two styles of federal-provincial relationship, two ways of defining the federal role within the Canadian whole.

We have to decide whether we shall preserve the Canadian federation's authentically federative character or whether we shall set it on the course of an increasingly abusive centralization.

We have to decide whether chronic confrontation instead of consultation between the two levels of government will become the rule in their relations.

Finally, we have to decide whether the federal government will continue to play the part of guardian of provinces regarded as minor governments, of manager of their dependency, or whether it will try to build a federation out of the new maturities which developed throughout the country, to bring them into line rather than constrain them.

Honourable senators, those are the questions we shall have to decide. God help us make such a serious decision.

[English]

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators, I will be speaking for approximately 20 to 25 minutes. Do you wish me to proceed now or take the adjournment?

Some Hon. Senators: Continue.

Senator Cook: Honourable senators, it is, of course, my intention to consider carefully all the views of senators who take part in this debate, but I doubt that I will be persuaded to vote in favour of the resolution.

I am opposed to the resolution because I am opposed to the federal government's unilateral action notwithstanding the disapproval of the majority of the provinces and the majority of Canadians.

I quote from a recent editorial in the Financial Post of Toronto which describes the legal situation in few but very clear words:

> The changes to the constitutional bill proposed by Justice Minister Jean Chrétien leave unaltered the basic flaw in the federal government's constitutional policy—the determination to act in defiance of Ottawa's sovereign federal partners, the provinces.

However, I am also very much opposed to the contents of the resolution. In this connection it is not correct to say that the Trudeau government has a mandate from the Canadian electors to enact a measure which requires Parliament to abdicate many of its powers and responsibilities, and to pass these powers and responsibilities over to the courts.

I quote from Professor Peter Browne, a distinguished member of the Department of History of Carleton University:

> Most of the witnesses before the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution concentrated their criticism on the provisions of the proposed Charter of Rights. As a result, some of the ambiguities, contradictions, restrictions and omissions have been identified, and may be remedied. What has still not been adequately discussed, however, is the underlying question of whether the ultimate responsibility for defining our basic social values should be transferred from the federal and provincial parliaments to the Supreme Court.

There are, indeed, many good and sincere people who seem to feel that if we have a Charter of Rights, and pass over to the courts the duty and responsibility of enforcing and interpreting it, this will prove to be a panacea, a universal remedy or cure for all our ills. Furthermore, they feel that the Charter of Rights must be placed beyond the power of Parliament, a legislature or the elected representatives of the people to repeal or amend. Those who subscribe to this theory argue that the court can and will do all that is necessary to protect and safeguard all our rights. Will this indeed be the result?

The last time there was a case before the Supreme Court of Canada dealing with human rights under the Constitution was in the year 1928. At that time the Supreme Court of Canada was asked to decide the meaning of the word "persons" in Section 24 of the British North America Act, and whether "persons" includes women. The court ruled unanimously, with not one dissenting voice, that "women are not 'qualified persons' " within the meaning of Section 24 of the B.N.A. Act, 1867, and, therefore, were not eligible for appointment by the Governor General to the Senate of Canada.

Did the court endeavour to reflect public opinion in 1928, and did it look to the future in order to decide this question, or did the judges look to the past to find some legal precedent on which they could hang their hats? Did they look at the state of public opinion in 1928, and did they endeavour to decide what should be the best decision for the future? A reading of the judgment indicates that they searched the past, and Chief Justice Anglin quoted with approval the words of Lord Esher of England, spoken in 1889.

Lord Esher had quoted with approval the words of Mr. Justice Willes, which Mr. Justice Willes had written in 1868, as follows:

> I take the first proposition to be that laid down by Willes J., in the case of Chorlton v. Lings. I take it that by neither the common law nor the constitution of this country from the beginning of the common law until now can a woman be entitled to exercise any public functions. Willes J. stated so in that case, and a more learned judge never lived.

In view of this record, why should we think that the courts will be pioneers in safeguarding human rights?

Fifty-four years ago I became a law student, and one thing I have learned for certain during that long period is that judges are often traditionalists but are not often reformers.

This is, of course, only one important reason why I think it is very unwise to legislate a Charter of Rights and put the provisions of the charter outside and beyond the powers of Parliament. It will be all too easy for cases to occur, concerning the human rights of our citizens, to have learned judges disputing among themselves as to the true meaning and effect of the Charter of Rights, and unfortunately the judges will look to the past for guidance and not to the future for inspiration; and if we follow the suggested course of enshrining the Charter of Rights, neither the federal Parliament nor any provincial legislature will have any right or power to pass corrective and amending legislation.

Fortunately, the women's rights case had a happier outcome. The judgment was appealed to the Privy Council in London and the court held:

> The provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, enacting a constitution for Canada should not be given a narrow and technical construction, but a large and liberal interpretation, so that the Dominion to a great extent, but within certain fixed limits, may be mistress in her own house, as the Provinces to a great extent, but within certain fixed limits, are mistresses in theirs.

Honourable senators will note the words "so that the Dominion to a great extent, but within certain fixed limits, may be mistress in her own house, as the provinces to a great extent, but within certain fixed limits, are mistresses in theirs."

That has been the clear, undisputed constitutional law for over 50 years, and is the law of Canada today; and no matter how the constitutional lawyers of the federal government argue the issues, the temporary occupant of the federal house cannot break and enter the houses of the provinces, nor has the mistress of the federal house the power to take over the control and command of any provincial house.

Many thoughtful Canadians are opposed to Parliament abdicating its powers and privileges to the courts through the enactment of an entrenched Charter of Rights. On the other hand, many thoughtful Canadians strongly favour the introduction of a Charter of Rights. Therefore, we must ask ourselves, is there a middle course which will satisfy both groups of sincere thoughtful Canadians? I think there is. I again quote from Professor Browne as follows:

> To consider the matter from another standpoint, the critical choice we have to make is not, as the federal government imply, between a Charter of Rights that is merely an "ordinary" statute and one that is "entrenched," but between different ways of entrenching (or better, "enshrining") a Charter. In fact, there is another way—a way that would not produce a regime of judicial supremacy, that is quite compatible with parliamentary government, and that seems much better suited to the institutions, practices, traditions, experiences, attitudes, needs and aspirations of Canadians.
> This way would accord the Charter of Rights a "priority status" (that is, a "paramountcy" or "overriding authority" in relation to "ordinary" statutes). Such a status could be ensured by various devices, one of which would be to give the Supreme Court a new responsibility: instead of only having to decide, as it now does, whether an impugned law fell within federal or provincial jurisdiction, it would also have to declare, as it has been reluctant to do, whether that law infringed the Charter of Rights. However—and this would be the crucial difference between our system and the American—even if the Supreme Court were to declare a law contrary to the Charter, that law could still be passed, providing certain requirements were met.
> As a way of both effectively curbing our parliaments and preserving their ultimate supremacy, a Charter of Rights with "priority status" might serve to reconcile the judicial and parliamentary supremacists, and so lead to the consensus that is indispensable for major constitutional reforms.

Professor Browne goes on to say:

> It will doubtless be objected that a Charter of Rights with "priority status" does not afford a sufficient guaran> tee of fundamental, and especially language, rights. So long as there is any possibility of a parliament "opting out" of the Charter, certain groups will not feel themselves adequately protected, whatever their actual situation might be in law or practice. Those who argue this way should take a hard look at the federal government's alternative. Are they really willing to allow our basic moral values to be ultimately defined, not by our elected and accountable representatives, but by nine appointed judges—who are largely chosen by the federal government, if not the Prime Minister, and who are not, like their American counterparts, subject to the scrutiny and approval of an elected body representing both the people and the provinces? Are they also prepared to chance the possible consequences of such an extreme transfer of legislative responsibility—a further politicizing of the Supreme Court, an increasing doubt as to the impartiality of our judges, a diminution of confidence in our legal system, a decreased respect for the Rule of Law, a reduced role for our elected representatives, an inferior status for our parliaments, a dwindling participation in the policial process, and the effects of all these changes on our sense of community, not to speak of national unity?

That concludes my quotation from the work of Professor Browne. I am sure I speak for all senators when I say "thank you" to him for his thoughtful analysis of the effect of entrenching the proposed Charter of Rights.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Cook: Honourable senators, the constitutional debate that is taking place in Canada can prove to be a very valuable and worthwhile national asset. It is late, but not too late for the government to adjourn the parliamentary debate while a first minister's conference is reconvened.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Cook: All Canada's first ministers should once again gather round, not the bargaining table but the conference table, and certainly at first debate in camera, seeking an honourable and reasonable compromise.

In view of the great debate that has already taken place, and the work of the joint parliamentary committee, there does now exist a real probability that a consensus, or, if not a full consensus, a much greater measure of agreement, can be reached on an amending formula and a Charter of Rights which can be accorded "priority status". Who has the right now to say in advance that a further meeting of first ministers must surely fail? Who has the arrogance to predict the future in such a negative way?

In closing, I will say a few words about the increasing tendency in Canada to tell the British what they must do and how they must behave. Our Secretary of State for External Affairs warns that grave consequences will follow if the Parliament at Westminster does not do what he tells them to do.

Senator Flynn: They must be trembling.

Senator Cook: I don't know if this frightens the British, but it sure does frighten me. "Grave consequences" can be a two-way street. If Canada has the power to punish the United Kingdom in one way or the other, the reverse also applies. Before our Secretary of State for External Affairs warns Great Britain of grave consequences, I trust he is fully satisfied that Canada will not suffer from any course of action he decides to follow. So I say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs: Please, please be more moderate and do not threaten so harshly.

Also, I have to point out to Prime Minister Trudeau that there are many Canadians who still have a deep affection and regard for the British, and we do not appreciate Mr. Trudeau's quite uncalled for rudeness. This conduct might ensure that Mr. Trudeau will get attention in the media, but he does not speak for many Canadians when he seems to try to be rude and to browbeat Westminster.

So I say to the Prime Minister: Please, please, speak more kindly, out of respect for our feelings, if not for the feelings of the British.

Many other parliamentarians in Canada are offering very positive and very arrogant instructions, if not issuing commands, to the Parliament at Westminster. It is all very well to speak of parliaments, but in the final analysis parliaments are made up of men and women, and in my opinion it is not reasonable to demand that honourable men and women have no option but to vote blindly for any measure, without even considering either the results or the rights and wrongs of the matter.

If Mr. Trudeau requires the Parliament at Westminster to take legislative action to give these constitutional amendments the cloak of legality, it is indeed arrogant to forbid these members of Parliament the elementary right to debate, examine, and, if deemed right and proper, to reject the measure.

Apparently, if the heretofore friendly Parliament at Westminster claims its normal rights and privileges, which are to examine any measure laid before it, then it will now do so under a new threat; that is, the threat of the unilateral declaration of independence of Canada. Of all the nonsense that has come out of the constitutional debate, this is the greatest nonsense of all.

The Imperial Conference of 1926 formally agreed that the self-governing dominions—that is, Australia, Canada, the Irish Free State, Newfoundland, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa— were "autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs . . ." In 1931 this agreement was enshrined in the Statute of Westminster.

In view of the provisions of the Statute of Westminster, from whom do we declare independence? From Australia? From New Zealand? From the Irish Free State?

Despite all protestations to the contrary, this is not a request to the United Kingdom to send the Constitution to Canada. It is a request to make substantial amendments to the Canadian Constitution in the United Kingdom, notwithstanding serious objections to the proposed amendments by and from "Ottawa's sovereign federal partners, the provinces" and from the population of Canada. There is no precedent which can be invoked or stretched to support this unwarranted request.

I feel confident that all this bluster, all these threats arise from weakness. They arise from Mr. Trudeau's perception that his resolution lacks sufficient merit to pass on its own. There would be no need for it if we were sending over to the United Kingdom a straightforward resolution, requesting—as, of course, is acknowledged by all, both in the United Kingdom and Canada, to be our constitutional right—an amendment sending the Constitution to Canada. Nor could any reasonable objection be made to Canada's requesting the United Kingdom to make one amendment to the British North America Act in the form of a reasonable amending formula which had the blessing of a reasonable consensus in Canada. For us to adopt the attitude, however, that the Parliament of the United Kingdom has to pass blindly any "dog's breakfast" we send over is neither reasonable nor rational.

I would agree that the U.K. Parliament should not endeavour to amend or improve any measure we send over, but I most firmly believe that any independent or self-respecting parliament can certainly reject it. To put the case clearly, suppose our Charter of Rights contained provisions repugnant to human rights. Must the United Kingdom pass that? Of course not. The answer would be, "Pass it yourselves, if that is what you want; but we will not." However, if it may be rejected because it lacks merit, it may also be rejected because it lacks a reasonable degree of support, because it is being imposed by a minority of sovereign partners on a majority of sovereign partners, and by a minority of the population on a majority of the population.

How can anyone criticize the British if they say, "If you don't speak with one voice to us, then in heaven's name take the B.N.A. Act and amend it yourselves. We want no part of it!"

Speaking for myself, in my view no one has the power or the right to tell me how to vote, particularly on such an important and far-reaching matter. Furthermore, I am not so arrogant that I claim for myself a right I would deny to the honourable ladies and gentlemen who are members of the British House of Commons or to the lords and ladies who are members of the British House of Lords.

I frankly expect that all these absurd comments will be counterproductive, and I anticipate with complete confidence that if the resolution does reach London, unaltered and still lacking the support of a reasonable consensus, then the Parliament at Westminster will act honourably and wisely.

Senator Flynn: Have you no defenders? Have you nothing to say on your side?

Senator Frith: In due course.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Fournier, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—THIRD READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C., for the third reading of the Bill S-15, intituled: "An Act respecting The Royal Canadian Legion".—(Honourable Senator Smith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I ask, pursuant to what I understand to be the agreement, that the first order, standing in the name of Senator Smith, be called now?

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I appreciate the kindness and courtesy of the Deputy Leader of the Government, but it seems to me that at this time, after having listened to two extraordinarily able and eloquent speeches, that the convenience and comfort of the house would be better served were we to deal with this matter on some other occasion. I therefore request that the debate on the first order of business be allowed to stand.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, February 25, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Letter addressed by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to the Minister of Energy and Natural Resources for the Province of Alberta, dated February 23, 1981, with regard to the curtailments of production and trade in Alberta oil.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

SASKATCHEWAN—CURTAILMENT OF OIL PRODUCTION

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I wish to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Nova Corporation has announced that unless an energy agreement is reached soon it will have to curtail its Saskatchewan oil production of 50,000 barrels per day on which it is losing $1 per barrel.

Would the minister indicate whether the government has satisfied itself that replacement for these 50,000 barrels a day will be available offshore if necessary, and, if so, at what price per barrel? What would such an importation add to the oil import compensation program deficit for 1981?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I could take the question as notice and work out the calculations with respect to the costs and arrive at the deficit. The honourable senator realizes, I am sure, that several members of the government, including myself, have, on a number of occasions, expressed the view that in the absence of an agreement the amount of increased production from Canadian sources is very regrettable.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

FOREIGN INVESTMENT—REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Martial Asselin: My question is also addressed to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Canada's foreign investment review policy has been under review by the government for some time. In light of remarks made again yesterday by the Special Trade Commissioner of the United States, Bill Brock—comments which Mr. Brock has been provoked to make twice within the last week—would the minister indicate when we can expect an announcement on the outcome of the review of foreign investment policy?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I cannot give a precise date as to when the results will be made known. What I can say is that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been looking at the comments made by some officials of the United States. These comments have not come from such United States leaders as the Secretary of State or the Secretary of Energy. It would be useful to know the position which these leaders take with respect to this matter.

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, the minister should know that Mr. Brock is considered to be at the level of a minister of the cabinet in the United States. Mr. Brock suggested that if Canada wants continued access to United States markets, it will have to provide the United States with access to our markets, including our investment market. If the minister cannot tell us when we can expect the report on the policy review to be tabled in the Senate, would he tell us now whether the government is considering implementing controls on investment?

Senator Olson: I do not believe the government is considering eliminating the controls under the Foreign Investment Review Act. Perhaps I should go no further than that at the moment, since we are now commencing a number of meetings with the new administration, including, as the honourable senator has reminded me several times, a meeting between the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States which will take place in a few days.

I would hope that this clarifies some of the positions taken by both sides with respect not only to the FIRA arrangements but also to a number of other matters that good neighbours should solve in a spirit of co-operation.

Senator Asselin: Would the minister assure the Senate that when the President of the United States is here in March this very important question will be raised and a statement from the minister will be made in the Senate?

Senator Olson: I can assure the honourable senator that I will draw that to the attention of the Prime Minister.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO CHRYSLER CORPORATION AND MASSEY-FERGUSON LIMITED

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: I should like to address my question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. I have the impression, as have many other Canadians, that the Government of Canada, through the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, has given taxpayers' money to Chrysler Corporation and to Massey-Ferguson Limited. Would the minister thoroughly explain the situation and tell us whether, in the long run, individual Canadian taxpayers will be spending money?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators a commitment has been made by the Government of Canada to underwrite or to guarantee a certain number of loans, thus enabling both of these companies to refinance their activities within Canada.

There has been, and there probably will be for a long time in the future—in fact, for several years—no call on the Canadian Treasury to put up any money for these undertakings. Indeed, if both companies are successful there will probably never be a call on the undertakings.

However, we have given an undertaking to underwrite or guarantee loans for the purchase of equity in these companies in order that they may reorganize their financing. We have done so with a reasonably high level of confidence that both of these companies will be successful as a result of this refinancing.

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, as a supplementary I should like to ask a very clear question: Is this going to cost the taxpayers of Canada any money? Would the minister answer yes or no?

Senator Olson: We hope that the answer will be no, but any time you take on a contingent liability such as this there is some possibility that the guarantee or the underwriting may be called. If that happens it will cost the amount due when it is called.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL TO JAPAN—USE OF INFRASTRUCTURE

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development. I have already asked several questions with respect to the Japanese coal deal, and today I should like to ask the minister if he can tell us if it is the expectation that the deal signed with Japan will be the forerunner of future deals. If so, will they involve other companies using the infrastructure which must be provided to make this deal possible?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, we expect that by the time the new superport on Ridley Island near Prince Rupert and the strengthened railway bed leading up to that port are completed in 1984, several other coal companies will be using those facilities in connection with their export sales.

Senator Donahoe: I have a supplementary question. The executive vice-president of the Teck Corporation, which is one of the companies involved in the British Columbia coal deal with Japan, suggested that the project could collapse. The reason he advances is that the rates to be charged to his corporation and to Denison are fixed at a level which will require them, in effect, to pay the total capital costs of the installation, and are beyond the capacity of those companies to pay. They were given to understand that in the future companies using those facilities would be bearing, and should bear, a share of the costs, thereby placing a less heavy burden upon the two companies originally involved.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the rail rate that is being offered to these companies and, indeed, the loading charge at the port will be the same for all companies over the same distance. Part of the undertaking that we have given is to guarantee that these two companies—Teck Corporation and Denison—have a maximum charge of $3 for loading the coal at Ridley, plus 80 per cent escalation. No company will have a more favourable rate than that, and, indeed, it will escalate through the years. At the end of 1989, if there is any shortfall in that rate related to costs, then there will be an additional charge to recover that shortfall. That, of course, would apply to all companies using the port.

At the moment the indicated level of the two contracts is about 6.1 million tonnes annually, with a high prospect of an additional one million tonnes, bringing it up to 7.1 million tonnes for these two companies.

I have had inquiries from several other companies which also want to reserve space, if that is the correct word, or that at least indicate to us that we should build the facilities large enough to accommodate at least another five or six million tonnes annually going through that port. We take this very seriously because the international market, particularly for thermal coal, is extremely viable at this time. There are a number of other companies, and perhaps one day when these inquiries become firmer in the form of an application for space, I will be able to give that detailed information to the Senate. I am confident that by the time the rail facilities and the port are ready for use, hopefully in late 1983 or 1984, we will have lined up tonnage far in excess of what is being contracted by these two companies now.

Senator Donahoe: I thank the minister for his answer, and I would like to ask a further supplementary. The gentleman about whom I spoke, the executive vice-president of Teck Corporation, also made the statement that the agreement was based on what his company thought was a firm undertaking from Ottawa that other companies, likely to sign later contracts, would bear part of the burden.

In the explanation just given, the minister has indicated the future use that he expects will be made of these facilities by other organizations and other companies, but he did not indicate to us whether that future use was taken into account in the fixing of the original rates, or whether Teck Corporation was, in fact, correct in believing that the rates were fixed at a level sufficient to impose the entire cost upon them and Denison.

My question is: Is it the minister's view that this position taken by Mr. Keevil was indeed the nature of the federal government's undertaking?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what appears to be the position is highly speculative. I say that because we do not yet have the returns from the National Energy Board's advertisement for proposals—that is, for the loading cost that would obviously be tendered to some private corporation. The National Harbours Board is committed to preparing the site, but we intend to call for tenders for a private corporation to put in the loading machinery and to operate it. At this point in time we do not have those proposals, and indeed we expect that it will be several months before we receive firm offers.

In the meantime, those two companies requested that we give them a firm undertaking as to what the maximum charge would be for the initial coal shipments, I believe for six years, from 1983 to 1989, and we did. The figure was $3 plus 80 per cent of escalation. At the moment there is obviously a high risk—or a low risk, or however you wish to interpret it—because if the bid comes in at something less or something greater than $3 per tonne, we have made that commitment that we would not recover that money until after 1989.

It seems to me that if you want to turn that argument around and say that those who are in there first will be guaranteed the lower rate or $3 plus 80 per cent of escalation, anyone, including those two companies, and anyone else who comes in after 1989, will be paying a level that will not only recover the costs of doing the loading after 1989 but, indeed, recover the cost of the shortfall between 1983 and 1989.

ENERGY

SASKATCHEWAN—CURTAILMENT OF OIL PRODUCTION

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Further to my earlier question with respect to Nova's probable curtailment of production, the minister's answer with respect to any possible action by the government seems to be one of regret. Does that mean that the government does not intend to take any further action in this situation and will just leave the situation as it is?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No, honourable senators. Had Senator Charbonneau listened a few moments ago, he would have noted that the Leader of the Government tabled a letter written by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to the Minister of Energy and Natural Resources in Alberta asking for negotiations to recommence, if that is the right word, and, indeed, to hold back the so-called restriction of supply while further negotiations take place to resolve the outstanding differences.

[Senator Donahoe.]

There is another aspect of the question that perhaps I should try to answer, although it was not specifically asked. It seems to me that the honourable senator was referring to oil production coming out of Saskatchewan. If that is so, I believe it puts the matter in a slightly different light; but, in any event, we sincerely regret that negotiations are not going on leading to an agreement between all of the producing provinces—in this case both Alberta and Saskatchewan, because the Lloydminster field transcends that provincial boundary.

Senator Charbonneau: Is the minister telling us that negotiations are continuing?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I could repeat constantly the same thing. There are discussions to try to reconcile the figures, as to the revenue and its distribution between the producing provinces and the federal government. I recall a few days ago that the Premier of Alberta indicated it would probably be into March before they would have completed the reconciliation of the figures. We had hoped—and I expressed that hope several weeks ago—that it would not take that long, but obviously it is taking that length of time. We are ready to recommence negotiations whenever it is possible for the producing provinces to come to the negotiating table.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

VISIT TO CANADA—PROPOSED AGENDA

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Is he in a position to inform the Senate as to what items are on the agenda for discussion between the Prime Minister and President Reagan on the occasion of the President's visit to Ottawa early next month?

● (1420)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the agenda is being prepared at the present time, and its details are being worked out with the White House. It is, therefore, not possible to be specific at this stage about all of the subjects to be covered, but I can say that it is anticipated that there will be discussions regarding the important international issues of the day, such as East-West relations, the Middle East, North-South relations, and so on. No doubt there will be a review of the preparations for the Ottawa summit, which is going to take place this summer.

On bilateral affairs it is expected that we, for our part, will wish to discuss the important environmental issues, the northern gas pipeline, the problems facing the North American automotive industry, the east coast fisheries issue and possibly certain other fishery matters, and a good number of others. The agenda will be a very full one.

The Prime Minister will be discussing with the President a range of bilateral and multilateral issues, given the critical problems currently facing both developing and developed countries. North-South relations will undoubtedly be one of the areas which will be considered by the two leaders. The Prime Minister has stated as follows:

As you know, when the Honourable the Secretary of State for External Affairs met with Secretary Haig recently, he expressed our concern at the prospect of any major reductions in the United States foreign aid program.

President Reagan's announcement of some reduction, therefore, causes us concern; it would, however, be premature at this stage to comment further as there remain some uncertainties as to how cuts are to be effected.

The Prime Minister has advised me further as follows:

As you know, Mr. MacGuigan has already expressed to Secretary Haig Canada's hope that President Reagan will attend the North/South Summit. I intend to inform President Reagan of Canada's continued support for the initiative and to indicate to him our view that countries such as the U.S.A. will have a valuable role to play in such an exercise.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I raised the same matter last week. I asked the Minister of State for Economic Development whether he could tell me the subjects on the agenda for discussion with the President of the United States. The minister replied that it was not customary to reveal in advance the questions on the agenda when the President of the United States or the leader of any other country visited Canada.

Yet, the Leader of the Government has just given us this agenda. I must therefore conclude that there is a different treatment for those who sit in the opposition and those who sit on the side of the government.

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, on that question of privilege, which is something of a phoney one, I would like to point out that the honourable senator obviously did not read my reply properly. I said that the customary tradition would be followed, meaning that when an agenda is worked out, and is ready for publication, I would see that it was brought in.

Furthermore, if the honourable senator had listened carefully to what the Leader of the Government said a few minutes ago he would have realized that he said, "No doubt these subjects will be discussed," because it is obvious that those kinds of subject would be discussed at such a meeting. The Leader of the Government was not describing a formal agenda.

Senator Asselin: Then why did he not say that?

Senator Olson: He said, "No doubt". I could mention a number of other such examples. I am thinking, for example, of the Garrison diversion in Manitoba, which is very important to many members of both this house and the other place. But the formal agenda that my honourable friend asked for is not ready, and I adhere exactly to what I said before. When the agenda is ready we will bring it in, and I will personally present it to the Honourable Senator Asselin.

Senator Asselin: You should try to agree with your boss sometimes.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I have a supplementary for the Leader of the Government. Have the agenda and the questions which he said would be discussed at the meeting been accepted by the Prime Minister, the Cabinet and the President of the United States?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as I stated, the agenda is now under negotiation—

Senator Asselin: Speculation, that is all.

Senator Perrault: —with the White House. There are a number of items to which my distinguished and able colleague and I have made reference. Obviously, some of these are destined to be discussed between the two countries. There will be a further meeting of cabinet on Thursday, and I presume the agenda may be discussed at that time. However, hopefully further information can be brought here soon. I will do what I can to make available to honourable senators further agenda information.

Hon. Lowell Murray: By way of a supplementary question, will the leader ascertain for us how long the President will be in Canada, whether his visit will be confined to Ottawa, and how much time in that program will be devoted to actual business sessions as distinct from social and ceremonial events?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. The precise allocation of time has not yet been finalized. If it can be made available, I will do so.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—PRODUCTION OF IRISH MOSS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege in reference to order paper questions. Last night I received an answer to a question submitted on May 16, 1980, concerning Irish moss, whereunder I asked:

1. What was (a) the total volume, and (b) the total value of Irish moss landings in each of the Atlantic provinces for the last ten fiscal years?

I would like honourable senators to listen, with what I am sure will be incredulity, to the kind of answer I have received. I asked for the volume and the value of Irish moss landings in the four Atlantic provinces, and the answer is:

This information is confidential, since it identifies individual respondents.

I suppose if I want to know how many potatoes were grown in Atlantic Canada, I would be told that number is confidential.

I then asked:

3. In what countries from 1969 to 1979 has Irish moss from Atlantic Canada been processed?

The answer:

> This information is not available, since data on country of processing is not collected.

The fourth part of my question was:

> 4. What was the value of such product?

Listen to this, honourable senators—after what I have just read to you, get this. There is no answer, you see, to the third part of my question, and the fourth part is answered in this way:

> This information is confidential, since it identifies individual respondents.

They could not find the answer to the third part, so in answer to the fourth part they say the information is confidential because it concerns individuals.

In the words of one of the immortal constitutional documents, I think someone is trying to do a snow job on me. I do not like snow jobs at this time of year; indeed, I do not like them done on me at any time of the year.

Senator Donahoe: You gathered no moss at all.

Senator Flynn: What about freedom of information?

Senator Macquarrie: I think that as a member of the national legislature of the Dominion of Canada I deserve something more than this bureaucratic effrontery. I do not thank any bureaucrat for preparing this for me, and I thank less any minister, whether it be the President of the Privy Council or not, who presumes to pass it on to me.

I raise one further question of privilege, honourable senators. I think it is very important in this national legislature that members of this house be treated with the same respect as members of the other house.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macquarrie: When I asked a similar question in 1978 with regard to Irish moss—which is very important; it may be a joke to some people, but it is not a joke to fishermen in Prince Edward Island—I was given the value; I was given the tonnage. Now, why can a member of the House of Commons receive that information and not a member of the Senate? Who is making that kind of invidious distinction? We are not elected but we are representatives. Our privileges should not be abridged. The only abridgement I can think of is that we can never, in this chamber, take part in a confidence vote—sometimes regrettably—and we have also lost half of our expense account—which I miss a great deal, I might add. But in other aspects we stand equal with them, and I do not like this flim-flam, this snow job, this disdain for a decently appointed and properly accredited member of the upper house of our national legislature.

● (1430)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I must be candid and—Senator Flynn: Plead guilty!

Senator Perrault: —and admit freely that the reply appears to lack the usual precision and detail which the opposition has grown accustomed to receiving from this side. Certainly, the response may not quite be in accord with the spirit of open government that we strive to maintain.

Honourable senators, the reply does seem to be less than complete and informative. I can provide no reason why anyone should consider as a state secret the amount of Irish moss gathered in a given time period. Perhaps the information is simply not available. I can only assure him that I will go back to the source and convey to that source—

Senator Flynn: A secret weapon!

Senator Perrault: —and convey to that source the eloquent words of the honourable senator.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: May I suggest to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that, while he is conveying that message, he also draw to the attention of the bureaucrat who prepared that answer from the Prime Minister, which told bureaucrats that, until the Access to Information Bill became law, they should act as if it were the law.

Senator Flynn: They had better practise in advance.

Senator Godfrey: Right.

ENERGY

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF PETROFINA CANADA INC.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask the Minister of State for Economic Development to take a look at the Senate Hansard for February 11, page 1638, in which reference is made to a consulting firm's advice to Petro-Canada with respect to its purchase of Petrofina?

I asked for the production of those papers. In his reply the minister said he would try to get more information "tomorrow". Well, "tomorrow" has gone by, but I repeat the request in the hope that I will receive an answer tomorrow.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I will try to make sure that the honourable senator does, but, frankly, I do not have at the tip of my tongue the reason for not bringing in the answer sooner.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ACCOMMODATION IN SENATE GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Before proceeding with items on the order paper, I should like to bring the Senate up to date on a matter of concern to all honourable senators.

I have received letters from many senators complaining that the Senate gallery in the House of Commons has been reduced in size. I conferred with my honourable friend, my predecessor, the Honourable Allister Grosart, concerning the history of the case, and we communicated with the appropriate people in the other place. I can now tell you that the gallery will be restored to its former limits.

I also received complaints from senators concerning the presence in that gallery of people other than senators and their guests, but leaving that aside for the moment I think I can safely say that the full Senate gallery in the other place will be available to senators.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I take this opportunity to express our thanks to His Honour the Speaker, and to the former Speaker, the Honourable Senator Grosart, for the successful efforts they have undertaken on our behalf.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

THE CONSTITUTION—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—PROPOSAL THAT RESUMPTION OF DEBATE BE FIRST ORDER OF THE DAY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yesterday we discussed the question of the order in which we should deal with Orders of the Day in view of the important constitutional debate now taking place. At that time I moved a motion to the effect that the Constitution debate would be the first order each day. Apparently that motion was not placed on the order paper as a motion, although I introduced it as such. That may be because I did not pass it to the Chair. In any event, Senator Roblin asked for an opportunity to consider my proposal. Since then he and I have conferred on the matter, and I have decided to withdraw my motion.

Since the matter was adjourned in his name, perhaps Senator Roblin has some comment to make.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the gist of the conversation was that it would be advisable to drop the motion and proceed on the informal understanding that, other things being equal, we would deal with this Constitution debate as the first item on the Orders of the Day. Having consulted with my leader and other senators on this side, I can say that we are agreeable to that proposition.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is quite satisfactory. My motion would have required an order of the Senate as an exception to rule 21, which might easily have included more exceptions than the rule anyway. Therefore, I propose that we follow the sound suggestion of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition.

Could we start this day off with a further exception? I think we should try to dispose of the first two Orders of the Day, since they are third readings. We could then plan to have royal assent for those two bills tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: I am quite sure you would rather have that exception as a standard rule.

Senator Frith: It is developing that way.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Henry D. Hicks moved the third reading of Bill S-17, to implement conventions between Canada and New Zealand and Canada and Australia for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. George J. McIlraith moved the third reading of Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if the sponsor of this bill does not intend to speak on third reading, I should like to do so briefly.

First of all, I wish to say that yesterday I raised a question in connection with the report of the committee, and I am pleased to say that the Honourable Senator Barrow made sure I received a copy of it in time for me to read it before the sitting today. For that courtesy I thank him.

The report has many good things in it. I much regret, however, that its treatment of the small business development bond proposition did not advance the issue a whit beyond what was in the original measure, and that the suggestions made by some, including myself, that the measure ought to be broadened to be more useful to small businesses in the country did not generate much interest in the committee.

My thought was that the scope of the assistance with respect to high interest rates to small businesses was entirely too limited, and that at least we should extend the scope of the bill from businesses in financial trouble and businesses wanting money for capital investment purposes to businesses which need working capital. However, that idea fell on barren ground.

I also advanced the proposition that it would be useful to consider whether the definition of "small business" could be extended. At the present time it includes incorporated small businesses only, but about two-thirds of the small businesses in the country are unincorporated. So this bill leaves them out in the cold.

• (1440)

I recognize that there are problems with both those issues in developing a system which would not be too wide in its compass as to be unreasonable, but it seems to me that at the present time the compass is too narrow to be reasonable. While I appreciate the fact that the chairman was kind enough to give me a copy of this report—and I have had a chance to read it—I must say that it has not altered my opinion on the merits of the measure.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

Hon. Edgar Fournier: Honourable senators, once again I feel it my duty at least to attempt to make a modest contribution to this long and complicated debate on patriation of the Constitution. This will likely be my last effort in the Senate, but it should not be thought of as my farewell notice.

Although I did not participate in the struggle and confusion of the study itself, I nevertheless followed the events through Hansard, the news media and the public in general. Without hesitation, I would admit to some ignorance on the matter. However, I have great respect for all the members of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution who worked so hard, day and night, with conviction and determination, in an attempt to bring about a greater Canada. But I wonder what they accomplished. What is Canada today, and what will Canada be tomorrow? What will patriation change, if anything?

During my absence from the chamber over the past few months, whenever my health and the weather permitted I travelled through my province to feel out the attitude of the people there towards the Constitution. At this point I must endorse the remark of my friend, Senator Denis, when he said, "Personally, I feel that Canadians have had enough of Constitution talk." I would add the word "referendum". In the eyes of the public, these two words have resulted in confusion, grievance and sometimes hatred. Today the people of New Brunswick are confused, frustrated and very nervous. Few understand just what is going on in Ottawa and why there is all this fuss when there is so much else to be done.

[Translation]

As I was saying, the people of New Brunswick are frustrated, confused and even disgusted with what is going on in Ottawa, when there is so much to be done, and so many projects are being neglected or suspended.

Their main concern is the additional expenditures Canadians will have to pay for in order to satisfy the ambitions of certain politicians and the ensuing abuses. For the vast majority, the Constitution is really of secondary importance. Actually, the Constitution itself is no great problem. The real problems are unemployment, the cost of living, the cost of gas and heating oil, the cost of food and domestic products, and, to top it off, the rise in interest rates and its disastrous effects.

Add to that repeated strikes in the public services in which too often the citizens are held hostage; and the progress of technology and automation which substitutes machines for men and women.

In a word, inflation in all respects: that is what the people of New Brunswick are concerned about today. And I sincerely believe that their feelings are shared generally right across Canada.

[Senator Roblin.]

[English]

I have classified the findings of my interviews into five groups. First, there are the retired people whose dream of a happy retirement is constantly being destroyed by inflation; then the professionals who are in agreement that our Constitution should be in Canada; and, third, the blue-collar workers with steady employment who are in agreement that the Constitution should be in Canada, but very few of whom could say why or even know why.

The fourth category is the man on the street, our labour force, the backbone of our society. The majority of these people could not care less where the Constitution is kept. Their main concern is the future of their children. They are frustrated by high interest rates, the increasing cost of heating fuel, gasoline, food, clothing, and inflation as a whole, including the devaluation of our dollar. Many of these people have had to seek out secondary employment in order to make both ends meet, but there is still the virus of income tax which takes the better part of their revenue.

The fifth and final category deals with the people on welfare, who are quite happy with the situation as it exists. I found that the majority of these people were very confused over such words as constitution, patriation, unilateral, bilateral, referendum and others.

The people of New Brunswick are worried about the extra cost, which will run into the millions, and the time which will be wasted, and they cannot understand why there is such a rush when there are so many other things to be done. I have been told by some people that it is time for Canada to stop spending money to uphold the monarchy in England; that Canada should have its freedom. Others are complaining about the lack of freedom and of being slaves to the Commonwealth. I might inform my friends from New Brunswick that at no time has the monarchy ever interfered with Canadian laws or administration, either federally or provincially. In my opinion, Canadians have too much freedom, and this is why everything seems to be out of control.

Another group is of the opinion that patriation will cure all the weaknesses of our society. I have news for them. As for Canada today and Canada tomorrow, patriation of the Constitution, in my personal opinion, will not change anything. The cost of living will continue to rise at a frightening rate, and it will not produce a bit of energy. The cost of heating oil and gasoline will continue to rise. Patriation will not prevent the price of food and domestic products increasing. It will not reduce the interest rates which are strangling our society. Patriation will not restore the value of the Canadian dollar, create a single job or influence mortgage interest rates or inflation. It will not put an end to the strikes in our society where, in so many instances, people are taken as hostages.

The Canada of tomorrow will be the same as the Canada of today. The ony addition will be the millions of dollars which Canadians will have to pay to satisfy the ambitions of some leaders of our society. Perhaps, if it is not already too late, the Canadian people should take the time to explore the word "dictatorship" and the consequences thereof. Certainly, Canada should be the master of its Constitution. After all, what is a Constitution? A Constitution is simply the rule book of democracy.

● (1450)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I rise to make a brief contribution to this historic debate, proud of being part of bringing Canada to full maturity as a nation.

We have reached a turning point in our constitutional history. If the proposed Joint Address under discussion is passed, we, like all sovereign nations, will have a Constitution that is thoroughly Canadian and one that can be amended and improved within our own country to keep pace with the changing reality of our dynamic country.

We all realize the importance of the question before us. Political partisanship, in my view, has no role in this discussion. We ought to present the arguments in the spirit of true Canadians, bound by the same interest and seeking a common end. I do, therefore, commend Prime Minister Trudeau for his personal sacrifices in endeavouring to bring our Constitution home.

Senator Flynn: That proves your point.

Senator Olson: Some complain that the federal government is acting unilaterally and proceeding with this matter before a thorough discussion has taken place. The allegations are, of course, untrue. There is no more important matter than that which all other law must be based upon. There is also no matter that has been examined and debated more thoroughly. It has been under actual consideration for at least 10 years—indeed, under intense examination for the past 10 months, in addition to the many unsuccessful attempts going back at least 50 years.

After the First Ministers' Meeting in September, a debate in the Senate and in the House of Commons, and three months of hearings before a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate, the matter is now placed in our hands. Politicians have cautiously and, I suggest, thoroughly examined the proposed Joint Address to the Queen. Representations from hundreds of groups across the country have been received; amendments have been proposed, and some amendments have been accepted.

There are three aspects to the proposed Joint Address before us: first, there is patriation of the Constitution; second, the provision for an amending formula; and third, a Charter of Rights. I would like honourable senators to examine each of these in turn, albeit very briefly.

The majority of Canadians demand the patriation of their Constitution. For over 50 years, Canadians have sought ways to bring their Constitution home, and since the passage of the British North America Act in 1867 we have made considerable progress. We have always been able to amend the unwritten part of our Constitution, such as our system of cabinet government within Canada. By bringing our Constitution home with an amending formula, we will have created a mechanism to permit a change when necessary. No longer will we go abroad to amend our own Constitution.

Honourable senators, I am convinced that there can be no patriation without an amending formula which provides for something less than unanimous agreement among the ten provinces and the federal government. Throughout our history we have found it extremely difficult to reach unanimous agreement on constitutional change among all eleven governments. Simple patriation would place Canadians in a constitutional straitjacket. For 54 years we have sought an amending formula. The attempts of 1927, 1931, 1935-36, 1961, 1964, 1971, 1975-76 and 1978-79 failed. This impasse cannot continue. For this reason, the government has proposed the amending formula agreed to by all eleven governments at Victoria in 1971.

Finally, in this Joint Address there is a provision for a Charter of Rights. As a Canadian from western Canada, I have always upheld and respected the rights of individuals in the state. Consequently, I strongly support the insertion of a Charter of Rights in this proposal. It is with some pride that I come from western Canada which has always promoted such a notion. The first Bill of Rights in Canada was passed by the Saskatchewan legislature in 1947. The first act of the present Premier of Alberta when he came to office was to pass a similar bill in that province. Such actions should be applauded.

However, if rights and freedoms are dependent upon governments of individual provinces, there will be no rights and freedoms common to all Canadians. I believe that Canadians, wherever they may live in Canada, should have common rights and freedoms.

The charter brings fundamental freedoms such as freedom of speech and religion. Most important, it establishes one Canadian citizenship by guaranteeing the freedom to live and to seek employment anywhere in this country.

The charter also includes language rights and recognizes the multicultural nature of our society. We, in western Canada, are proud of the long history of English- and French-speaking Canadians working together to build that part of our country. From 1670, when the British Crown granted a charter to the Hudson's Bay Company over Rupert's Land, English-speaking Canadians have joined their French-speaking compatriots in helping to explore and develop the region. Indeed, the very idea of a bilingual country is not foreign to the west. From 1877 to 1892, the Northwest Territories, which then included the present provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, were bilingual.

The Honourable Leader of the Opposition sits and laughs and makes funny noises, although he promised a few days ago that he would not. I take this debate very seriously.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: What I am saying is not particularly new because it has been said before but, to set this matter in perspective, I will review some of the events that have happened in the past when we have had matters of great importance before the Parliament of Canada.

Over the past 114 years Canada has been enriched by the arrival of many immigrants of various ethnic origins. The multicultural heritage of Canada is such an essential part of the fabric of our nationhood that it must be reflected in our Constitution and it is. Finally, this proposal recognizes, for the first time, the aboriginal rights of the Indian, the Inuit and the Metis peoples of Canada. Together, we will build a great nation.

In examining the Charter of Rights, I think of the speech made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in Edmonton, the capital of my native province, on September 1, 1905. The very day Alberta entered Confederation as a province, the then Prime Minister said:

> Let me say to one and all, above all to those newly our fellow-countrymen, that the Dominion of Canada is in one respect like the Kingdom of Heaven, those who come at the eleventh hour will receive the same treatment as those who have been in the field for a long time.
> We want to share with them our lands, our laws, our civilization. Let them be [Canadians], let them take their share in the life of this country, whether it be municipal, provincial or national. Let them be electors as well as citizens. We do not want nor wish that any individual should forget the land of his origin. Let them look to the land of their ancestors, but let them look also to the land of their children. Let them become Canadians . . . and give their heart, their soul, their energy and all their power to Canada—

Honourable senators, I am proud to stand on the side of history. Today, we are witnessing the same type of debate as has gone on several times in our past. Every time there is an occasion to build and strengthen Canada's nationhood, there are those who resist. Two great issues come to mind immediately in this respect: the debate over the establishment of a distinctive Canadian flag, and the debate over Canadian citizenship.

The question of the flag goes back to 1925. It was the year I was born. At that time, again in 1945-46, and finally in 1964, essentially the same arguments were made. Those opposed never find the timing right. There are always more pressing matters that should be discussed. For example, on June 17, 1925, the Mail and Empire printed the following letter:

> Sir,—With regard to the proposal of changing the Canadian flag, we of the rising generation who expect to control the destiny of our country in some not far distant day, wish to enter a protest—a most emphatic protest. Surely the Government in such times as these, with strikes and unemployment threatened on all sides, could turn their hands to something of greater national importance.

Although timing is often an excuse, the real reasons for opposition always surface. In 1925, Mackenzie King's attempt to give Canada a distinctive flag was opposed by those favouring the Union Jack—the flag of another country.

Charles D. Stebbing wrote a letter on June 18, 1925, to the Mail and Empire, in which he sounded a typical note:

> THE UNION JACK FOREVER. The Union Jack was, still is, and always will be our flag. It was the flag that many brave fellows died for, and is the flag that all veterans in Canada are living for. It is not certain at this moment whether Mr. King is under the influence of the United States in his desire for a change of flag.

Such opposition caused Mackenzie King to drop his idea of giving Canada its own flag until 1945. At that time, former Prime Minister John Diefenbaker led an attack against the idea. He said:

> There is no subject on which one could speak that gives greater opportunities for exalted expression of sentiments than the flag . . . One hundred and fifty years ago on my father's side my ancestors came to this country in order to seek freedom under the Union Jack. My maternal ancestors came to the Red River as Selkirk settlers. They came to this country which had as its emblem the Union Jack.

After a joint committee of Parliament sat from November 27 until December 4, 1945, and from March 29 to July 12, 1946, after 14 public sessions, after 2,695 designs were considered and after 42,168 written submissions were received, Mackenzie King had enough of flags and let the matter drop.

Senator Grosart: High time, too.

Senator Olson: In 1964, former Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson took up the matter again. This time Mr. Diefenbaker led the opposition again. He said:

> If the government had calculated a means whereby division could succeed in this nation, they could not have gone about it in a more effective manner.

There were other equally ill-considered comments by Canadians throughout the country, and I refer in particular to one dated May 20, 1964, from Montreal, and I quote:

> As citizen and churchman I earnestly deplore the design of the projected new flag as pagan and a flat rejection of Canada's Christian heritage.

Senator Flynn: Try to be relevant.

Senator Olson:

> The glory of the Union Jack is the union of three Christian Crosses. How unworthy, how unfeeling to replace so inspiring a symbol with one reminiscent of a hockey team or an Indian tribe.
> How can the Canadian government expect priests and clergy to bless a national flag which utterly ignores our holy heritage?

Senator Flynn: What has that to do with the debate?

Senator Olson: The same lamentable story that occurred during the flag debate took place in April, 1946, during discussion of the Canadian Citizenship Bill. Senator Croll has drawn that to our attention a number of times. At that time, Mr. Kidd, M.P. for Kingston City, claimed there was no urgency in the matter. He said that the whole question of Canadian citizenship should be postponed, as it had been in 1931.

Senator Flynn: Bring back conscription! Come on!

Senator Olson: Mr. Church, M.P. for Broadview, went further. He claimed that the Citizenship Bill:

> —invaded the jurisdiction of the provinces. I suggest there should be a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada under the Supreme Court Act to find out whether Parliament has power to enact a measure of this kind of citizenship. I believe that it has not, and that it is ultra vires of the dominion.

Furthermore, he added, that it was:

> —one of the most unfortunate measures ever brought before the House of Commons and will create more disunity in Canada than we have seen since Confederation.

> I believe that this bill is going to lead to a lot of disunity in this country. It is based on the statute of Westminster, which changed the status, autonomy and sovereignty of this dominion. This bill is based on that empire-wrecking statute.

Senator Flynn: Oh, come on!

Senator Olson: In exasperation, he asked:

> Who is asking for this bill? We do not know. If the government put the bill through they will live to regret it. It may satisfy some people in the country, but I would point out that we all owe allegiance to one sovereign and one empire. British citizenship is the greatest thing in the world.

Senator Flynn: Do you contest that?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there is something else that I hold higher than that, and that is Canadian citizenship.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Try to be relevant. You are entirely irrelevant.

Senator Olson: Although these cries of woe were uttered as recently as 1946, they sound strange in our ears and in the ears of all Canadians who are proud that they can call themselves Canadians, and who are able to do so legally. That is important to me.

Senator Flynn: What has that to do with the present debate?

Senator Olson: By virtue of the law I am now able to call myself a Canadian—

Senator Flynn: Nobody disputes that.

Senator Olson: By virtue of the law that Mr. Kidd and Mr. Church so vehemently denounced in 1946. It is the old Tory line, and I do not want to get into this partisanship—

Senator Flynn: Obviously.

Senator Olson: —but he is asking me to do it.

Honourable senators, that is—

Senator Flynn: Cheap and dirty!

Senator Olson: —that is some of the history of—I hope you realize—

Senator Flynn: Cheap and dirty!

Senator Olson: I hope you realize that is being recorded.

Senator Flynn: If that is the kind of speech you want to make, you will have to put up with my protests. If you want to lower the debate to that level, we're willing to accommodate you.

Senator Olson: You are not keeping your promise. You said you were not going to interrupt.

Senator Flynn: You are worse than you have ever been. Totally irrelevant.

Senator Olson: No. If the honourable senator wants to make my speeches for me, he may as well read them, too.

Senator Flynn: Nobody would make that kind of speech except you.

Senator Frith: I would.

Senator Flynn: I don't doubt that for one moment. I had forgotten about you.

Senator Frith: And some others.

Senator Olson: What I have repeated to you today is some of the history of important debates that have taken place in this Parliament.

Honourable senators, what shall history say about the debate on the proposed Canada Act of 1980? Are we to rise to the occasion and make our children proud of us? This measure is advantageous to all Canadians.

Senator Flynn: Ask Mr. Ryan.

Senator Olson: As George Brown—

Senator Flynn: Ask Mr. Ryan about that.

Senator Olson: As George Brown, a Father of Confederation, while arguing for the British North America Act itself, noted:

> Let us approach this measure as a sharp critic deals with abstract questions, striving to point out blemishes . . . but let us approach it as men having but one consideration before us—the establishment of the future peace and prosperity of our country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Ask any political party in Quebec about that. Surely you don't think that the senators from Quebec reflect truly the feelings of our people when they show unqualified support for this resolution.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I leave the subject to your judgment in the belief that the decision you render will be worthy of the Parliament of Canada.

I want to conclude my remarks by expressing my appreciation to Senator Hays, the co-chairman of the committee, and, indeed, to all other senators for the valuable contribution they made to this important resolution.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: That is the most despicable speech I have ever heard in this place. Absolutely shameful!

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, to calm things down a little, I will begin by congratulating Senator Hays and the other members of the committee who really worked very hard and did a very comprehensive and conscientious job. I know that all of us extend to them our congratulations. Congratulations are also in order for Senator Austin for his lucid explanation of the resolution and the process through which it passed in the committee.

• (1510)

Senator Tremblay displayed the erudition to which we have become accustomed. In many cases, my only response, in the time available, can be that I disagree with him. I must say that I disagree also with Senator Cook on his basic point concerning the Charter of Human Rights. I am more saddened by his scolding of the Prime Minister. I was in England two weeks ago and found no such interpretation being put upon the comments of our Prime Minister or of our Secretary of State for External Affairs on matters which are obviously seen as being of sincere concern to all Canadians.

I heard the speeches of Senator Fournier and Senator Olson as sincere expressions by two distinguished Canadians.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Sincere? So far as Senator Olson is concerned, I disagree.

Senator Stanbury: I accept as being completely sincere the remarks of Senator Fournier, and I would expect similar courtesy for the frankly expressed opinions of people on the other side of the house.

Honourable senators, I was honoured to chair the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution during the Thirtieth and Thirty-first Parliaments. During this Parliament I chaired the Subcommittee on Senate Reform, which was a part of Senator Lamontagne's Subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. In the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution we studied and made recommendations concerning the subject matter of Bill C-60, and that was one of the parliamentary processes which helped to evolve the principles contained in the present resolution.

Senator Lamontagne's committee continued that process of evolution, and its work on a Charter of Human Rights has been reflected in several ways in the present resolution. That process has now been going on through the Thirtieth, Thirty-first and now the Thirty-second Parliament; it has been going on for several years, and for anyone to suggest that it has been hurried is little short of ludicrous.

There are many aspects of the work of those committees which have not yet come to fruition. The present resolution is extremely limited in scope. It deals only with the patriation of the Constitution, the adoption of an amending formula, and the enactment of a Charter of Human Rights. Those are important elements in giving the Canadian people an opportunity to deal with their constitutional problems, but they are not the problems themselves and mark only the bare beginnings of the work which has yet to be done.

By now we all agree that we have serious problems in our interprovincial, federal-provincial and inter-regional relationships in Canada. The product of those problems is regional alienation. The national policy of Sir John A. Macdonald, reflected in the B.N.A. Act of 1867, is long since obsolete. That realization has become more and more pronounced over the last 50 years. From time to time during that period we have made many efforts of varying seriousness to restructure our system in a way that will meet the needs of a modern Canada.

It has also become obvious that cosmetic surgery is not enough, that we need structural change. We need a reform of Parliament, of both houses, to better represent the competing vested interests and regional needs of the country.

There have been many suggestions for abolition or reform of the Senate, as if that by itself would be enough to repair the lopsided parliamentary representation of people and interests on Parliament Hill. I believe most people now realize that the future demands that the House of Commons be differently constituted as well as a new look being taken at the makeup and powers of the Senate.

How is significant parliamentary reform to be accomplished except by changes in the Constitution, and how, in the present circumstances, can those changes be accomplished?

Although we naturally begin by differing on what we are looking for in a realignment of the division of powers between federal and provincial governments, there seems to be very little disagreement with the suggestion that there does need to be a re-examination of the powers exercised by each level of government, a redefinition and a rationalization of those powers. I dream of our governments coming to the table in a reasoned way to settle those questions in the manner best able to serve the interests of the Canadian people.

I confess that sometimes those dreams, based on observation of past experience, turn into nightmares; but how else are we going to be able to resolve those problems except by constitutional change, and how, under the present circumstances, can those changes be accomplished?

If the restructuring of Parliament and the redefinition of governmental powers are troublesome areas, which must be addressed to alleviate our national agony, then surely the experience of settling fiscal arrangements will be horrendous. All we have to do is to recite some of the statistics. Federal transfers to the provinces, for which the provinces make no accounting whatever, now constitute 25 per cent of the federal budget. Only 33 per cent of the tax dollar is now spent by the federal government. Sixty-six per cent is spent by the provinces. The per capita income from all resources in Prince Edward Island in 1978-79 was $3; the per capita income from resources in Alberta was $1,874.

There are fantastic differences in financial resources available to provincial governments in Canada's 10 provinces, and a growing resistance among the "have" provinces to the concept of a sharing community. Before we reach agreement in that difficult area there will be many financial and emotional crises, but they will only be laid to rest when at least the principles of sharing can be written into the Constitution. How can that be done under the present circumstances?

I have just identified three of the problems which must be tackled by way of amendment to the Constitution. It may not be possible to accomplish the necessary changes, no matter what we do, but at least we know that they cannot be accomplished unless the Constitution is here, in our own hands, and unless it comes here in a manner which allows it to be amended by a process which is reasonably within the reach of our governments.

The first two elements of the resolution are aimed directly at accomplishing those two objectives. All national political parties agree on those objectives. The only difference is that the Conservative Party wants an amending formula which would give each province the right to opt out. It is such an impractical proposal that it is hardly worthy of attack. There would not then be any commonality and therefore no real community in their vaunted community of communities. But even here the government has left room for compromise if a more acceptable formula can be found during the next two years.

Now the question is, should we just do that much? Should we do nothing about the entrenchment of a Charter of Human Rights in our Constitution until it is in Canada with an amending formula, with or without the right of the provinces to opt out? To me the answer is very clear. We are going to be entering into a period of great strain—the restructuring of Parliament, the redivision of governmental powers, changes in fiscal arrangements—which will require real changes in our Constitution. All of this can be argued at length by the experts and the politicians, without great danger to the daily lives of individual citizens, provided that the individual Canadian is protected by a basic system of entrenched rights which are the same for him as they are for his fellow citizen in each of the other provinces; otherwise the play of emotions, the struggles for power, and the tug-of-war over vast sums of money, may well bring about an encroachment on those rights.

The protection of an entrenched Charter of Human Rights is the absolute minimum which can be accepted by the ordinary citizen before he lets loose the hopefully constructive, but potentially destructive, forces of the constitutional equivalent of civil war. Anything less can only exacerbate the regional alienation which the whole process was intended to cure. We simply cannot for long have a country in which its citizens have different basic human rights, depending upon where they live in that country, and the individual rights of the citizen must never be held hostage to the street-fighting among governments over which of them will wield what powers and dispense what resources.

• (1520)

Senator Stanbury: The New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party, most of their parliamentary supporters, and some parliamentary supporters and provincial premiers of the Conservative Party, are in agreement that these three elements of the resolution before us are an essential prelude to the difficult process of constitutional reform which lies ahead of us.

How, then, should it be accomplished? Ideally, it should be done by negotiation. There is a terrible libel abroad, mouthed by many politicians and slavishly repeated by many in the media, to the effect that the federal government has been inflexible, that the provincial governments have been pliable—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Smith: Don't be silly.

Senator Stanbury: —and that if only the federal government and Mr. Trudeau would go away everything would be resolved happily in a trice and we would live on forever in good humour and good health. We know that that is simply not true. Mr. Trudeau has met with the provincial premiers more often than any Prime Minister in Canadian history. He has proposed areas of discussion in which it seemed most likely that the governments could come to agreement. He has clearly stated the kind of concessions the federal government felt it could make. Neither the federal government and the provincial governments nor the provincial governments by themselves have been able to come to agreement, not because of Mr. Trudeau's intransigence but because in each case one or two premiers have had special deals that they wanted to impose as a condition of their acceptance.

Senator Flynn: Like Premier Davis!

Senator Stanbury: Another libel abroad is that making a start on constitutional reform is a particular obsession of Mr. Trudeau's.

Senator Smith: Of course it is!

Senator Stanbury: Certainly, he has identified it as one of the most urgent problems that Canada has. I can hardly imagine that there are responsible and knowledgeable Canadians who do not now agree with him entirely. I am grateful for his foresight and leadership, but also for his painstaking efforts at negotiating, even if negotiation has failed.

If negotiation is unproductive and the need is becoming more urgent, then how should a responsible government react? It should find a way of using its legitimate powers to patriate the Constitution. I appreciate that there are those who argue that these are not legitimate actions of the federal government, but I am satisfied to have that decision made by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Senator Donahoe: Trudeau is not.

Senator Stanbury: So I believe that any responsible government should patriate the Constitution if it legally can. It should ask for patriation on the basis of the only amending formula which has at some point found acceptance among the parties involved, and it should ensure, through the entrenchment of a Charter of Human Rights, that a Canadian is a Canadian is a Canadian wherever he or she may live in Canada. The government is simply proposing to do what is necessary to build a practical foundation for future reform. It is entitled by law, and obliged by the circumstances and its duty, so to do.

Like most honourable senators I find that there are a number of improvements I would like to see in the constitutional package. For example, I regret that the provincial governments rejected the preamble which had been proposed by the federal government last June. It would have put the beginnings of our constitutional reform in a context which most of us feel would dignify it with the sentiments and principles which have long guided this country and by which we have tried to live.

The preamble which the Prime Minister proposed to the provincial premiers, and which unfortunately was rejected by them, reads as follows:

A Statement of Principles For A New Constitution

We, the people of Canada, proudly proclaim that we are and shall always be, with the help of God, a free and self-governing people.

Born of a meeting of the English and French presence on North American soil which had long been the home of our native peoples, and enriched by the contribution of millions of people from the four corners of the earth, we have chosen to create a life together which transcends the differences of blood relationships, language and religion, and willingly accept the experience of sharing our wealth and cultures, while respecting our diversity.

We have chosen to live together in one sovereign country, a true federation, conceived as a constitutional monarchy and founded on democratic principles.

Faithful to our history, and united by a common desire to give new life and strength to our federation, we are resolved to create together a new Constitution which:

shall be conceived and adopted in Canada, shall reaffirm the official status of the French and English languages in Canada, and the diversity of cultures within Canadian society, shall enshrine our fundamental freedoms, our basic civil, human and language rights, including the right to be educated in one's own language, French or English, where numbers warrant, and the rights of our native peoples, and shall define the authority of Parliament and of the Legislative Assemblies of our several Provinces.

We further declare that our Parliament and provincial legislatures, our various governments and their agencies shall have no other purpose than to strive for the happiness and fulfillment of each and all of us.

If that preamble had been included—and perhaps we should still include it by way of amendment—it would be clear that—

Senator Flynn: Could I put a question? You say this preamble is not in the resolution because of the opposition of the provinces?

Senator Perrault: The Conservative premiers, yes.

Senator Flynn: Why didn't you put it in just the same? You did not have the approval of the provinces for other aspects of the resolution.

Senator Stanbury: I am simply indicating my own desire to have such a preamble in the resolution.

Senator Flynn: Why do you say we have not got it because of the provinces?

Senator Stanbury: Because the provinces rejected it.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but you did not care how the provinces felt about other matters. Why this one?

Senator Stanbury: If that preamble had been included—and perhaps we should still include it by way of amendment—it would be clear that we celebrate the status of a constitutional monarchy under the fatherhood of God, according to our native peoples their aboriginal rights, and declaring ourselves to be committed to the linguistic rights of our two founding peoples and to the preservation of the cultural heritage of our citizens from a multitude of ethnic origins.

I would like to see more explicit women's rights. I would like to see more reference to economic rights. I would like to see a number of other things. But I am satisfied that the joint committee did the best they could to accommodate the various representations which were made to them. I am also satisfied that because the process of constitutional change will always be difficult in Canada, and because the priorities of constitutional reform will now have to shift to the reform of Parliament, the division of powers and the fiscal arrangements, it will be many, many years before there will be another opportunity to get an entrenched Charter of Human Rights in Canada.

If we fail to grasp this opportunity, I believe that another generation will pass before the occasion again arises. As a matter of fact, if this effort at patriation and adoption of an amending formula fails, I wonder which prime minister, of which party, will have the personal and political fortitude to try again.

It is time to move on. This resolution is the basis and the necessary foundation for our other constitutional reforms.

The pallid alternative offered by the Conservatives lets the provinces opt out of constitutional change, provides no entrenched codified common rights for Canadians, now or ever, and ensures that there will be no common standards in many matters of national concern. We are at a constitutional impasse. I believe that the government has found perhaps the only available means of breaching that impasse and giving Canadians the opportunity to prove to themselves and to the world that they are capable of fashioning their own society to their own liking.

Senator Smith: The world is watching!

Senator Stanbury: The task cannot begin until the impasse has been broken.

Honourable senators, by joining our colleagues in the other place in passing this resolution, we remove the road block and demonstrate our faith in the wisdom and judgment of our fellow Canadians.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I wonder if my honourable colleague, Senator Stanbury, would permit a question. It is a very sincere question, with no partisanship about it at all. I know Senator Stanbury's background, and the work he has done with regard to the church, the Deity, and so on. He quoted from the preamble that was previously presented. In the course of that preamble reference is made to the Deity. Would the honourable senator kindly advise me why, in the recent Constitution hearings, the Liberal members of that committee, along with the New Democratic Party, said, "Away with the Deity, and away with references to the Deity. We will have nothing to do with the Deity"? I just wonder if he would explain that to me—and I say this sincerely—in the light of his important background in church work, and things of that nature.

Senator Stanbury: I am sure that individuals in every party have their own points of view. What I was giving you was the proposal of a preamble given by the Government of Canada to the provincial premiers. Perhaps I should correct something which may have been misleading because of lack of information. My understanding of what happened was that the premiers said, "We do not want to talk about the preamble until we have the whole Constitution put together." I was wrong in saying it was a rejection, but it was not accepted at that time as the preamble for the Constitution. If it had been, it would have referred to these matters which I regard as important.

Senator Flynn: Well, of course, the correction Senator Stanbury is now making was suggested to him by Senator Frith—that is obvious—and I know the discipline on the other side. However, my question is: Why don't you impose that on the provinces? Seven provinces opposed, for instance, the insertion of a Charter of Rights at this time, yet you imposed it on them. Senator Perrault has said that the Conservative government did not want it.

Senator Perrault: At that time.

Senator Flynn: The Prime Minister played politics with Ontario and with New Brunswick—

Senator Roblin: And with Saskatchewan.

Senator Flynn: —and with Saskatchewan, but without success. My question is: Why do you impose certain things on certain provinces and not on others?

Senator Roblin: There is no answer.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Macquarrie, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 12 the debate on the motion of Senator Godfrey for the third reading of Bill S-15, respecting The Royal Canadian Legion.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I would like to begin by assuring you that I shall not attempt to impose myself on too much of your time, and that I will try to be even briefer than my customary brevity.

I would like to begin by saying, for the record, that I am a member in good standing of The Royal Canadian Legion and have been since my discharge from the active list of the army of Canada in February, 1946. Therefore, whatever I say will certainly not be from any anti-Legion point of view, though I disagree with the bill and some of the things which have been said.

I have just noticed that Senator Godfrey is not present. I may have led him to believe that I would not engage in this debate unless he, as the sponsor of the bill, were present. I am not sure whether he was here earlier. Perhaps one of his colleagues could let him know that I recall what I said to him in that regard; however, since the order has been called, I do not know that I want to stand it.

Senator Steuart: I think he expected to be involved.

Senator Smith: Yes, he and I had a conversation last evening in which I told him that I expected to engage in the debate if the order was called today. He and I had not an extensive communication, but at least one that would lead him to believe two things: one, that I intended to speak today; and two, that I would not like to speak if he were not present. Perhaps we could let the order stand until a little later in today's proceedings.

Senator Flynn: There will be nothing else today, I am afraid.

Senator Smith: Is there nothing else? I could easily go on—

Senator Frith: We will see if we can locate Senator Godfrey.

Senator Steuart: Perhaps go on for an hour or so.

Senator Smith: Well, that might tax even my long-winded ability.

In any event, I wish to begin by referring to a comment made by Senator Godfrey. At the moment it escapes me whether he made it in this chamber or whether he made it in the committee hearings, but it was to the general effect that, after all, the Legion did not have to bother with legislation from the Parliament of Canada or elsewhere to effect its incorporation; it could very well have been incorporated under the ordinary procedures available to societies or organizations of that kind. Of course, I agree with him that that is so. However, the Legion did choose the route of legislation; it chose to ask Parliament to legislate it into existence and to give it a set of rules by which its existence might be continued. I think that, once having enjoined the aid of Parliament, the Legion must live by the rules of Parliament. It cannot really expect parliamentarians to say, "Well, whatever you want you may have." It must justify what it asks us to do on the grounds of what is in the best interests of the organization, which I acknowledge is an extraordinarily important one which has done perhaps more good in this country than any other secular organization I can think of. I have the greatest regard and respect for what it has done, for what it is doing and for what I believe it will do. That does not necessarily, however, bring me to the point of agreeing with whatever its leadership decides is the best thing for that organization and its contribution to the country.

I would like to draw your attention to clause 1 of the bill, which is really the only clause on which I want to make any comments. Clause 1 of the bill would repeal paragraph 4(a) of chapter 84 of the Statutes of Canada, 1948, which is what one may call "the qualification for membership" clause of that statute as it exists today. Paragraph 4(a) reads as follows:

> to constitute an association of
> (i) those persons who have served or are serving in Her Majesty's navy, army or air force or any auxiliary force thereof,
>
> (ii) those persons who have served or are serving in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and
> (iii) the sons and daughters of any of those persons referred to in subparagraphs (i) and (ii),
> which association shall be democratic and non-sectarian; and shall not be affiliated to or connected directly or indirectly with any political party or organization;

Let me contrast that with what is proposed to be substituted for it, which is found in clause 1 of the bill we are considering. It reads:

> to constitute an association of those persons who have served or are serving in Her Majesty's armed forces or any auxiliary force thereof, and of other persons who support the purposes and objects of the Legion, which association shall be democratic and non-sectarian and not affiliated to or connected directly nor indirectly with any political party or organization;

• (1540)

Senator Frith: I am sorry to interrupt you, Senator Smith, but I have been informed that we are unable to reach Senator Godfrey. May I suggest that you continue in his absence? Or, if you prefer, it would be quite in order for you to move the adjournment of the debate in your own name in order to continue the debate tomorrow, when Senator Godfrey might be present. We will support whichever option you choose.

Senator Smith: I certainly thank the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate for his courtesy in informing me of the situation and suggesting that he would support either option. I feel it would be more in accordance with the sort of tacit understanding that I thought Senator Godfrey and I had, if I were to move the adjournment of the debate so that he could be present for the rest of it, having read the words of wisdom of which I have already delivered myself. Accordingly, I move that this debate be now adjourned.

On motion of Senator Smith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, February 26, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

February 26, 1981

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Julien Chouinard, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 26th day of February, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to a bill.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

THE ROYAL FAMILY

BETROTHAL OF H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES TO LADY DIANA SPENCER—ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following message had been received from the House of Commons:

ORDERED: That a Message be sent to the Senate informing Their Honours that this House doth unite with the Senate in the Address to His Excellency the Governor General respectfully requesting that His Excellency may be pleased to transmit to Her Majesty the Address of both Houses of Parliament expressing our great happiness to Her Majesty and His Royal Highness the Prince Philip on the announcement of the engagement and forthcoming marriage of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and Lady Diana Spencer, and have inserted in the blank spaces therein the words "and House of Commons".

ATTEST:

C. B. Koester
The Clerk of the House of Commons.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Capital Budget of the Northern Transportation Company Limited for the year ending December 31, 1981, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with Order in Council P.C. 1981-363, dated February 12, 1981, approving same.

Capital Budgets of the Atlantic Pilotage Authority, the Great Lakes Pilotage Authority, Ltd., the Laurentian Pilotage Authority and the Pacific Pilotage Authority for the year ending December 31, 1981, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with respective Orders in Council P.C. 1981-360, 1981-361, 1981-362 and 1981-364, dated February 12, 1981, approving same.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, March 2, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, it is proposed that we sit on Monday evening next week, so that we will have an extra day for the debate on the Constitution and other matters. However, I want to assure the house that the question of settling a schedule for dealing with this debate, and other Senate business, is still under discussion between the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO RECEIVE PRESENTATION FROM NATIONAL FARMERS' UNION

Hon. G. I. Smith, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, in response to a request from the National Farmers' Union, be authorized to receive a presentation from representatives of that Union with respect to certain issues relating to the Crowsnest Pass and, if the committee considers it necessary, to report thereon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Smith: I ask the indulgence of honourable senators in order to make a comment or two in explanation.

I have been informed by representatives of the National Farmers' Union that they are sending a delegation to Ottawa on Monday and Tuesday of next week to meet with various ministers and others. They have particularly requested that they be allowed to appear before the committee to make some representations. This request came to my notice only late yesterday afternoon. I have communicated with all three of the members of the steering committee of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, who seemed to be in agreement that it is reasonable to accede to that request. Consequently, I place the motion before the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ESTIMATES

INCREASE IN GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to address some questions to the Leader of the Government with respect to the estimates that were referred to in the House of Commons yesterday. I am not sure whether they have been tabled yet, but certainly the information in them has already reached us, by courtesy of the media. Therefore, I suppose it is in order to ask a question on the topic, which I direct to the Leader of the Government.

Can the leader explain to us why it is that the increase of approximately 13 per cent in total budgetary expenditures for the year is considerably above the increase in the growth of the economy as estimated by the government. I would ask him to compare that fact with the undertakings given in Toronto by the Prime Minister on February 12, 1980, during the last election campaign, when he said, "We will hold the line on government expenditure growth under the rate of the gross national product." Obviously this has not been done; the promise has not been fulfilled. I would ask my honourable friend, the Leader of the Government, to tell us why.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I say that the estimates have not been tabled in the other place, and there is an embargo on detailed information with respect to them. As I have said, the President of the Treasury Board has not tabled those estimates in the other place. It is true that there appears to have been a lack of observance of the embargo by certain members of the media, but that does not authorize me or any other minister to comment on the reports which have been quoted by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, and I shall not do so at this time.

By way of information, may I suggest to honourable senators that the reports circulated by the opposition, that the government has in some fashion not observed its previous practice with respect to the tabling of estimates, are most incorrect. For approximately 11 years there has been what is described as a lock-up where, at 11 o'clock on the morning it is proposed that certain estimates be tabled, members of the media are invited to gather in an assigned room where security is imposed. They must sign an agreement that they will not release any information with respect to the estimates, and they will not divulge the contents of any of the material provided for them, until that material has been tabled in the other place. This is an agreement which has been observed by the media during the course of several governments.

May I say in addition, honourable senators, that in order to make sure that the members of the loyal opposition can at least deliver on behalf of the opposition knowledgeable comments with respect to the estimates this practice was adopted four years ago by a Liberal government—that is, to have delegated members of the opposition meet with the President of the Treasury Board for an information luncheon on the day of the proposed tabling, a process designed to enable members of the opposition to discuss some of the contents of the estimates, and to ask questions. This was done yesterday to help members of the opposition to understand the estimates better and to provide them with certain documents. That practice was followed this year.

I might say, honourable senators, the practice was not followed when the Conservatives were in government a few months ago.

Every effort has been made by the government to observe the previous practice, a practice observed, generally, by both Liberal and Conservative governments. That is why I find it rather remarkable that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, knowing about the media embargo and with full knowledge of past practices which respect parliamentary traditions, would be on his feet today attempting to discuss details of what he alleges to be the estimates.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, just because the government is so incompetent in managing its affairs and has allowed itself to be caught in this unseemly mess, I really do not feel that I am called upon to make any apology for them, let alone for myself.

I was not honoured with an invitation to lunch with the President of the Treasury Board or whoever provides these titillating little tidbits of advance information to people, but I can read, I can listen to the radio and I can see the television. There is absolutely no way I can disabuse my mind of the facts, even though the Leader of the Government prefers to hide behind a screen rather than deal with them.

I will put out of my mind the fact that I have read it in the newspapers; I will put out of my mind the fact that I have seen it on the television; and I will put it out of my mind the fact that I have heard it on the radio. I will simply say to my honourable friend that I do know what the Prime Minister said on January 12, 1980. He said that we would hold government expenditure growth to under the growth rate of the GNP. My question to the minister is: Is this still the policy of the administration?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the economic objectives delineated by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister remain, of course, the objectives of the government.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: Again I come back to the immediate question which is before Parliament: In the public interest, shall information with respect to the budget or the estimates be shared with the media in advance, in return for certain guarantees of security until the estimates are tabled?

Senator Flynn: That is not the question.

Senator Perrault: Should this information be shared with the media before the information is tabled in Parliament?

I understand that a motion is under debate in the other place now, and there is a possibility that the entire affair may be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. There have been complaints from parliamentarians. I understand those complaints.

I am sure the honourable senator, when he was Premier of the Province of Manitoba, would have felt very aggrieved had the newspapers and the radio stations publicized the contents of his budget before he had had an opportunity to present that budget on the floor of the legislature in Winnipeg. The situation in which the government and Parliament find themselves now is similar in nature.

Questions are being asked as to whether the Canadian media broke the embargo, or whether it was certain clients of national news-gathering organizations. I think it is important to obtain answers to those questions.

Let me reiterate, however: The government followed all the customary practices of the past. As well, the President of the Treasury Board met for an information luncheon with the person designated by the Conservative Party to be their representative. After this courtesy had been extended, this member of the other place felt that there was a move towards Nazism by the government—if anyone can imagine such a ludicrous overstatement.

Senator Olson: It is a description of their logic.

Senator Perrault: It really is, as Senator Olson has stated, an example of some of the distorted logic being pursued by the opposition.

Senator Flynn: That is the end.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, never has a government been more forthcoming with respect to the tabling of estimates than we have attempted to be under these circumstances.

• (1415)

Senator Roblin: I am sure that we are all entertained by this once-around-the-circus. Now the Leader of the Government has honoured us with a second turn-around-the-circus, but he will not deflect me from asking my question, which is obviously the aim of this particular exercise.

Insofar as my previous experience in another capacity is concerned, I must tell the honourable senator quite candidly that we were able to manage our affairs much better, and we never had such a contretemps. Senator Guay does not agree with me. If he has evidence to the contrary, then let him bring it forth. I will share that better system with my honourable friend because, indeed, his colleagues obviously need some sound advice on this matter. The advice is that the meeting be held after the presentation in the house. That was our method. We would have the press in after the meeting of the house. It is a very sensible way of doing things. The honourable senator should follow this method or smarten up with regard to the way in which he is doing things now.

I would like to come back to the question. On February 12, 1980, during the last election, the people were given five economic pledges by the Prime Minister while he was in Toronto. The first of those pledges was: "We will hold the line on government expenditure growth under the rate of the gross national product." I ask my honourable friend a simple question: Is this still the policy of the government?

Senator Perrault: If the honourable senator wishes to initiate a debate on the government's economic policy—

Senator Flynn: No, we just want a reply. Say yes or no.

Senator Perrault: It is so interesting to see a group of writhing Tories because they are so very animated. If the honourable senator wishes to initiate a debate on the government's economic policy, then he should bring forward a motion.

Senator Smith: Answer the question.

Senator Perrault: If the honourable senator were to bring in a resolution then we could have a full debate in which we could present all the facts of the government's economic policy before the Senate and the people of Canada. Yes, and in the process we could discuss the potentially disastrous effects of the insane energy policy proposed by the previous government.

Senator Flynn: What about your policies.

Senator Perrault: If that energy policy had been implemented, it would have boosted the inflation rate to 19 per cent per year. Yet this same opposition group talks in terms of keeping down inflation. So, let us have that debate here in the Senate.

Senator Smith: Answer the question.

Senator Perrault: Let us use the Question Period for the purpose it was intended, namely, to answer legitimate questions about matters of the moment.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I always appreciate the advice tendered to me by the Leader of the Government, although he never seems to take that advice himself. The honourable senator seems to have forgotten that just last week we debated the government's economic policy in connection will Bill C-54. In the course of that debate, I had the opportunity to outline the five promises made by the Prime Minister in connection with his financial policy, and we are talking about the first of those promises today. After making my contribution to that debate, and much to my surprise, nobody—I repeat, nobody—on the other side rose to defend the Prime Minister or to defend the economic policy of the government.

Senator Olson: Because your interpretation was wrong.

Senator Roblin: Gentlemen opposite may be able to add, but they cannot figure. They cannot figure out the facts from the promises, or the promises from the policies. That is what I am trying to find out. I have asked my honourable friend twice whether it is the policy of the government to honour the promises given to the Canadian people on February 12, 1980, by the Prime Minister.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, let us say that if the honourable senator wishes to have a formal debate on the state of the economy, we will welcome it. However, I will not participate in a misuse or an abuse of the Question Period by delivering a long speech on the subject of economic policy.

Senator Flynn: Senator Olson would do it.

Senator Perrault: The government has an excellent record with regard to keeping its promises. The objectives which have inspired the government's economic policy are well known to senators opposite.

Senator Roblin: Is my honourable friend prepared to answer the question? I would like a "yes", "no" or even a "maybe" answer.

Senator Flynn: Senator Steuart said no. We will take that.

Senator Steuart: Or maybe, or possibly.

OIL IMPORT COMPENSATION PROGRAM

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Despite the rather strange manner in which this information with regard to the estimates has come to hand, I have learned, and I am sure that the minister is aware, that the government proposes to cut spending on the Oil Import Compensation Program by $2.3 billion next year.

[Senator Flynn.]

● (1420)

My question is: Can the minister indicate to us if, in reference to this particular program, it is a fact that the Canadian taxpayer will indeed enjoy this saving of $2.3 billion on the oil import compensation program?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, what Senator Donahoe is trying to do—and I can guarantee right from the beginning that he will not succeed—is to engage me in a debate on a matter which has already been accurately described by the Leader of the Government. In short, we are not going to comment on the estimates until they are tabled in the other place.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: That message is simple and straightforward. I see no reason why any senator on the other side of this house should have difficulty in understanding that. The senators on the other side can come at it from any angle they like but the answer will be the same.

It may be that the estimates will be tabled in the other place in the next few minutes, but in the meantime I can assure my honourable friend that he will not engage me in such a debate, despite the fact that the opposition in the other place acted in such a way as to prevent the government's tabling those estimates when they ordinarily should have been tabled, namely, at about 3 o'clock yesterday afternoon or shortly thereafter. They did that by raising questions of privilege. I will not comment on whether or not those were phony.

Senator Perrault: They were delaying as much as possible.

Senator Olson: They were delaying, deliberately delaying, perhaps for the benefit of the gallery, but in this case you are certainly not going to draw me into participating in that kind of exchange.

No matter what your questions are, if they relate to information that was leaked out of the lock-up, I will not be drawn into a debate on that subject matter until the estimates are tabled in the other place.

Senator Flynn: That's a good excuse! Maybe for once you have a good excuse for not answering.

MEDIA BRIEFING—ADMISSION OF OPPOSITION MEMBERS

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: I have a supplementary question which, in this instance, I should like to direct to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Is it not a fact that for some time past, on occasions when lock-ups have been prepared, it has always been the practice to admit members of the opposition as well as members of the media, and if members of the opposition chose to attend, naturally, they did so on the same terms and conditions as members of the media?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, surely it is a monumental tragedy that the once great Conservative Party—

Some Hon. Senators: Hah, hah!

Senator Perrault: —so dedicated at one time in its history to the ideals of parliamentary procedure, should have been reduced in this case to petty efforts to delay a proper tabling of the estimates, vital information to every Canadian.

Consider the petty tactics used in the other place—three time-consuming strategies, three petty strategies, employed in order to delay the tabling of those estimates. As soon as the media publicized what were alleged to be the contents of those estimates, as soon as the news wires began to chatter with information about the alleged estimates, the Conservatives in the other place began their theme: "There has been a violation of parliamentary privilege. For goodness sake! This material is on the street". The strategy was calculated and deliberate.

Let me tell you what the Liberal government did in this case. Instead of waiting for representatives of the opposition parties to request permission to attend the so-called lock-up, the President of the Treasury Board invited both opposition parties to an information luncheon with free and open access to raise questions and problems with him personally. The luncheon practice by Treasury Board heads was initiated by a Liberal government in the spirit of open government. Significantly, the same courtesy was not extended to the Liberals a few months ago when the Conservatives formed the government. The Tory minister responsible never thought of providing information on the same scale to opposition members of Parliament.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

An Hon. Senator: You tell 'em!

Senator Perrault: I want to tell certain honourable senators in opposition that some of us have become tired of their pontificating about the respect their group holds for the parliamentary system, when on too many occasions members of the opposition or their colleagues in the other place seek to invoke the pettiest parliamentary devices to keep the proper business of the people from being dealt with and debated by Parliament.

Senator Donahoe: I have another supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Is it not a fact that in this instance, when persons of the opposition sought admission to the lock-up, it was refused to them? Is it not true that the privilege of attending the lock-up was willingly granted to members of the media but was refused to members of the opposition? Is it not a fact that what is being debated in the House of Commons now is a question of privilege concerning whether the privileges of the opposition were taken away from them by that action?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as usual, I bothered to check the facts before rising to speak today.

Senator Flynn: Bravo!

An Hon. Senator: How unusual!

Senator Flynn: Bravo!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

● (1425)

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, Oh!

Senator Perrault: I checked the facts, and I thank the members of the opposition for their tumultuous applause.

Senator Smith: It is so unusual for you to check the facts.

Senator Perrault: It has never been a practice for any previous government, whether Liberal or Conservative, to have members of Parliament attend a lock-up. It has, however, been a practice, instituted recently by Liberal governments, to provide both the new Democrats and the Conservatives with direct access to the minister—not through agents, not through departmental officials, but directly, face to face, over an information luncheon. On such occasions, prior access to certain documents is provided. Indeed, I can assure honourable senators that once again on this occasion informative documents were provided by the Honourable Donald Johnston, the President of the Treasury Board, together with highlights of the estimates, summary charts, a full press kit, and other key material. This practice of information sharing in advance of tabling was instituted by a Liberal government in the cause of more open government.

The Conservative critic who said, "I was not allowed to go into the press lock-up," was the very person who had lunch with the President of the Treasury Board and was given prior access to estimates information. I ask honourable members of the Senate, and particularly those in opposition, is this conduct by their party representative in the highest parliamentary tradition?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): May I rise on a point of order?

The Honourable Leader of the Government is getting excited—

Senator Roblin: I would call it "carried away".

Senator Flynn: Yes. He gets carried away, accompanied by a groan from Senator Langlois, as usual. It is so interesting to listen to the senator's comments. You know what he means, but you do not know what he is saying. However, that does not matter.

I am rising on a point of order, which is as follows. The Honourable Leader of the Government is discussing what happened in the other place, with specific reference to comments by members, not by ministers. I think he is therefore entirely out of order. Will he not agree, however, that part of the question of privilege that delayed the tabling of the estimates by the President of the Treasury Board was raised by an allied group, namely, the NDP, in the other place?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, my information—

Senator Flynn: You said you checked the facts!

Senator Perrault: —is that the delay was pulled out of the Tory bag of tricks, primarily. These delaying tactics do not add one whit to the reputation or lustre of Parliament.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Will the minister say whether his colleague, the President of the Privy Council, Mr. Pinard, last night, after the other place adjourned, told the Canadian Press that they could then consider the embargo lifted?

Senator Perrault: It is not my practice to comment on fragmentary press reports. If we had a full transcript of the proceedings I would then be able to assess whether the honourable senator's question deserves an answer.

Senator Flynn: You said you checked all the facts. You should know.

Senator Murray: May I ask the minister whether he will ascertain immediately, because it can be done immediately—he has a stable of highly paid and comfortably placed assistants around to do this—

Senator Frith: Would you say that again, so they can hear you?

Senator Murray: —highly paid and comfortably placed assistants who can find out. Would the minister make an effort to find out immediately, as he can do by having an assistant go down to the other place and inquire of Mr. Pinard whether, in fact, Mr. Pinard advised Canadian Press, when the House of Commons adjourned last night, that the embargo was lifted; because if he did that it seems to me that the point raised by the Minister of State for Economic Development is hardly valid, and if the estimates have been made public on the initiative of Mr. Pinard, on behalf of the government, surely we are fully entitled to discuss them and ask questions about them in our Question Period here?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have two points. First of all, I understand the present debate in the other place relates to possible breaches of privilege. There is a motion to refer this whole matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the other place. Secondly, honourable senators, further information will be sought. There will be the usual avid pursuit of the facts.

Senator Murray: With great respect, I would like to have the minister ascertain right away whether in fact his colleague, the President of the Privy Council, gave that authorization to Canadian Press at 6 o'clock, or thereabouts, yesterday evening, so that we can get on with our discussions here.

Senator Perrault: One thing seems obvious, and that is that the official opposition, in this particular instance, seems to have far more knowledge about what happened in the media than does the government—

Senator Flynn: That is usual.

Senator Roblin: Where are the facts that you checked?

Senator Perrault: —which makes one wonder about the whole scenario.

Senator Murray: The conspiracy theory.

● (1430)

ENERGY

DOMESTIC OIL PRICE—SUGGESTED INCREASE

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Mr. Robert Blair, President of Nova Corporation stated yesterday that the best first step in resolving the current energy impasse would be to increase the domestic price of oil by $10 per barrel to meet the needs of 1981-82. Would the minister care to comment on that?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The only comment I make is that it is obviously Mr. Blair's opinion.

Senator Charbonneau: Mr. Blair also mentioned that the National Energy Program contains several proposals which could damage energy development, factually and psychologically, unless they are modified. His views are supported in the report yesterday of Data Resources Canada which stated:

> If the National Energy Program could be modified to encourage the required $200 billion in energy investment during this decade, many of its detrimental effects would be remedied.

Would the minister therefore answer this question: Is there a precise number of experts, representing all sectors of the economy, who must object to the National Energy Program before it is changed substantially; and, if so, how close are we to attaining that number?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I know of no such number. What I do know is that there are a number of changes to the National Energy Program that have already been announced, which are in keeping with the government's statement of October 28, and a few days following that, stating that we brought in a National Energy Program in the absence of an agreement with the producing provinces, even though we had tried to come to an agreement with them—which, of course, was the problem faced also by the previous government. After negotiating for several months—I believe about seven months—it brought in a budget also in the absence of an agreement with the producing provinces.

We believe there may be some additional changes required. We acknowledged that even in the speeches made by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources following the budget of October 28. What, in our view, is still essential is that there be negotiations and an agreement between the producing provinces and the federal government to determine what changes can be made, one of the principle items being revenue sharing, and all of the peripheral matters that would be part of that overall energy program or energy agreement. Certainly, it is our hope, expressed almost every day, including yesterday, that we can get back to the negotiating table and try to reach an agreement.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: As a supplementary, it seems to me that since October 28 the government has heard from experts in all sectors of the Canadian economy. It seems to dismiss totally the virtually complete opposition of the energy industry, be it multinational or Canadian, and it disregards the views of the financial community and the manufacturing sector, including those of small business. I might add also the majority of the provinces and, of course, the official opposition. I am just stating facts. I have to state the facts for the information of the minister, because he does not seem to know them. Would the minister tell the Senate if the cabinet has decided that it is completely wedded to its energy program in the face of all the opposition?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No, honourable senators. The government has stated its view over and over again. I am surprised that it has to be said every day that this government is anxious to negotiate an agreement with the producing provinces.

Senator Charbonneau: On its own terms.

Senator Olson: On whatever terms can be agreed to in those negotiations. In case my honourable friend has forgotten, I have explained the status of that several times from the floor of this chamber, and I am sure that he had access to the news media which honourable senators were talking about a few moments ago. Apparently they listen once in a while, but they must listen selectively, because Premier Lougheed of Alberta has stated several times—in late January and, I believe, again in February—

Senator Frith: And Mr. Leitch said it yesterday.

Senator Olson: It was said yesterday by the Minister of Energy and Natural Resources for Alberta that they are not ready to come back to the negotiations. The reason they give is because there is still required a reconciliation of the factors going into the totals respecting revenue-sharing and a number of other things. Until they have reconciled those figures, they do not believe it would serve any useful purpose to recommence, if that is the right word, the negotiations.

I am surprised that honourable senators opposite have not absorbed that from all the news media and from the statements that have been made here, because certainly it has been said over and over again.

DOMESTIC OIL PRICE—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the minister. One thing that I have been able to absorb is the promises made to the Canadian public by the Prime Minister of Canada on February 12, 1980. On that famous day he made a pledge about oil prices. He ridiculed the Tories for having failed to make a deal with the producing provinces, and then said, "We will negotiate an increase of less than 14 cents in the price." When is the government going to deliver on that promise?

An Hon. Senator: It's too late.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The government has been delivering on all of the promises it made during the election.

Senator Flynn: He won the election. That was the only objective.

Senator Roblin: Would the minister admit that it was just a piece of fancy election baggage?

Senator Olson: No, I will not admit that, because it does not happen to be true.

Senator Roblin: What I quoted about the Prime Minister's statement is true, but as for his having fulfilled the promise implicit in the statement, that is not true.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator has every right to give his interpretations of things. They are usually wrong, but that is his business. If he wants to continue to make interpretations that are obviously different from many other intelligent interpretations of those things, that is up to him.

Senator Flynn: Subjective.

Senator Roblin: I am not interested in interpretations, not even the minister's interpretations. What I want are answers, and that is what I don't get.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator always tries to have a premise or to have his question predicated on some interpretation, and usually it completely destroys the content of the question.

Senator Roblin: Does the minister deny that the Prime Minister made that statement on February 12, last year?

Senator Olson: I do not deny that; I deny the interpretation that the honourable senator has put on it. There is one thing: I think that perhaps the honourable senator has the date wrong.

Senator Roblin: In that case, if my honourable friend is able to give me the date, perhaps he can tell me when the promise is going to be fulfilled.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. It is a rather serious matter, and I am sure the minister will be anxious to comment on it. I understand that his colleague, the only elected minister west of Ontario, stated in Winnipeg yesterday that the Province of Alberta was blackmailing the rest of the country. As the minister responsible for Alberta, would the minister comment on that?

Senator Olson: I am not sure that I understand the question about the blackmailing. If the honourable senator would like to spell that out a little better, I will try to reply.

Senator Doody: I will do so. The minister was telling us a few minutes ago how important it is that negotiations between the Province of Alberta, his native province, and the Government of Canada be recommenced—which is a rather strange word to use, nevertheless, it is the one that he used—and that both sides get together for the benefit of the country.

• (1440)

I would like to know if he agrees with this comment made by his colleague—and I am referring to the province of Alberta—and I quote:

> We are allowing regional chauvinisms and provincial jingoisms to dominate the discussion of how this economic dynamism of the West can be utilized and shaped.

The honourable minister from Manitoba is also quoted as saying:

> This is a form of blackmail being used by one province against the rest of the country. That's very serious.

I think that is a very serious matter indeed, if that is the sort of terminology that is going to be used in order to try to heal the wounds that are now open in this country. If you want to speed up negotiations, I would suggest a more temperate form of language could be used to entice the Albertans to talk sensibly to the present federal government.

I am asking the honourable minister, who is a representative of Alberta, if he would care to disassociate himself from his colleague's remarks.

Senator Olson: I understand what the honourable senator is asking now. The question was: Would I care to comment on it, and the answer is, no, I would not care to comment on it.

Senator Doody: I have a supplementary question. If the honourable minister does not wish to comment on his colleague's ill-tempered and ill-advised insults to his own province, would he care to disassociate himself from his colleague's comments?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what Senator Doody is doing again is—

Senator Doody: —asking questions.

Senator Olson: He is asking a question, but he sets it up on a whole lot of preamble and predicated on his interpretation of what he sees here and there. If he would like to send me all these clippings in the context in which the remarks were made, then perhaps I will comment on them. In the meantime, I will wait until I see that background.

Senator Donahoe: Anybody who uses that kind of language is Axworthy!

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I will try my question once more for the sake of the record. In my experience with governmental affairs in the province of Newfoundland, this is the sort of language that is guaranteed to upset a province, no matter how big or how small that province is. If a minister from the federal government were to accuse the Government of Newfoundland of blackmailing it while I was a member of the Newfoundland cabinet, we would be incensed and upset, because it is not good diplomatic language and is language we hardly ever use in ordinary circles, let alone in intergovernmental discussions.

The minister, Mr. Axworthy, was given a prepared address, I gather, to a hundred federal civil servants. Of all the audiences to pick to make a comment like that to, this is unbelievable. Nevertheless, he tells those civil servants that they are in the front line of defence, and that they are supposed to keep the werewolves of Alberta away from the gates of Ottawa, and that what we have to do is tell these people in Alberta that they are blackmailing the rest of the country. I ask the minister from Alberta if he will disassociate himself from those comments by his colleague.

[Senator Doody.]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have nothing to add to the comments that I made a few minutes ago.

Senator Doody: I'm not surprised.

Senator Olson: I suppose we are going to have to listen to these speeches that are completely out of order as long as the galleries are full of delegates from the Conservative convention.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. May I ask the honourable gentleman if he agrees or disagrees with the comments of his colleague, Mr. Axworthy, as outlined by Senator Doody? Does he associate himself with them, or does he disassociate himself from them, or does he believe they were said?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is very difficult for my honourable friends opposite to understand. They should have heard the answer I gave a few minutes ago, if they were listening. I want to make sure that the comments were made and, indeed, in that context, before I make any comment. Is that clear enough, or should I say it two or three more times?

Senator Muir: Coming from you, I think you would have to say it half a dozen times to try to make some sense. In any event, it would appear that the honourable gentleman seems to know all the answers but he does not even know the questions.

Senator Flynn: But he never gives the answers.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of State for Economic Development? I am not so much concerned, as some members are, about what Mr. Axworthy said, because I know him a little better than most. Therefore, I suppose I can roll with the punches with respect to this.

Senator Frith: He will probably make some comment.

Senator Roblin: No doubt he will, and I will not object if he does.

The point I really want to make has to do with the audience to which he addressed himself. Here it appears to be an audience of civil servants who are being given the pure milk of the gospel from a political leader on a highly sensitive political issue. One has to wonder if this is appropriate. Could my honourable friend find out for me—of course, he cannot answer today—just to whom Mr. Axworthy did speak?

Senator Doody: He will try to say they were Conservatives in the gallery.

Senator Roblin: Why were they called together? What was the purpose of the meeting, and just what did Mr. Axworthy say? When we have those facts that are quite independent of any newspaper report to which my honourable friend takes such violent exception, we will then be able to form some judgment as to whether he is trying to further politicize the civil service.

Senator Olson: I will try to obtain that information.

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF PETROFINA CANADA INC.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, while I am on my feet I would like to advise Senator Roblin as to a question I had taken as notice, having agreed to come back with an answer the next day—that would be February 16. In checking the record, I find that I did in fact answer that question the next day.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I ask what the answer was, and with respect to what?

Senator Olson: With respect to the purchase of Petrofina.

Senator Roblin: Did my honourable friend deal with the report that was mentioned in my request for information?

Senator Olson: I will read part of the reply:

> Petrofina is a wholly integrated company comprising activities in exploration, development, production, refining and retailing.
> Petro-Canada, based on their assessment of the worth of Petrofina, has concluded that $120 per share is an appropriate amount. While the details of this assessment must remain confidential, Petro-Canada's track record in acquiring other companies, for example, Pacific Petroleum and Atlantic Richfield, is a good one, and the corporation has earned the confidence of government and the people of Canada.

I could read the rest of it over again, but the point is that there is an assessment that must remain confidential for the time being, and I am not sure whether or not that can be released some time later when the whole deal is consummated. If it is available then, I will provide it to my honourable friend.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for the explanation, but let me tell him that I do not think it is satisfactory, in the circumstances. Were Petro-Canada a private organization, in the usual sense of that expression, then, of course, it would be no business of this Parliament as to what they did or on what advice they relied for what they did. That is not the case.

The president of Petro-Canada made a public statement in which he was dealing with the question of valuation—a question which has been challenged—and he relied in his answer on a report that he had received from independent consultants. Obviously, the issue is closely related to the production of that report. Even if he had said that and it had been a private company or even a government corporation that was raising money in the traditional way to support its activities, there might be some question about it, but that is not the case.

We have been told by the same Mr. Hopper that he is asking government to provide in one way or another $1,460,000,000 in order to finance this deal. Certainly, a large portion of that will directly bear on the taxpayers of Canada or on those who use gasoline in Canada, because it is the government's stated policy to raise the money that way. Here we are being asked to provide a very large sum of money for a public enterprise, and I think that in that case we, in the opposition, have a duty to make sure that the price that is being set for this matter is fair in the circumstances. From that point of view, I suggest to the minister that it is in the public interest, and that we are justified in saying that we are entitled to know about that independent report on which Petro-Canada relied, and on which, in large part, is going to be based a large call on the public purse.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, whether it had been a large or small amount, I accept the validity of the question that, inasmuch as it is a crown corporation and the related matters Senator Roblin referred to, it is in a different category. I want to check how long it will be before the rest of the information leading up to and including this assessment can be made public.

I say that on the basis that there are some factors or considerations in the total acquisition that are not fully consummated to the point where even the amount of that financing is known. We know what Mr. Hopper's request is. It is for 100 per cent. But whether or not it will be 100 per cent or some smaller percentage is not yet known. Indeed, the amount, or how that money will be raised, is also not finally decided. Certainly that information will be made available in due course.

Senator Roblin: I am sorry that the deal is so incomplete at the moment that the information cannot be produced. I really would be astonished if the government decided to raise $1,460,000,000 through the gasoline tax system. I cannot believe that is going to happen. Something else must surely be done because, if this deal is any good at all, part of it at least can be financed in the ordinary financial way. I am taking from what the minister said that he is giving me an undertaking that at an appropriate date he will produce the document I am asking about.

• (1450)

Senator Olson: I am giving an undertaking that I will look into it.

Senator Roblin: Do you feel the public has no right to know?

Senator Olson: No, I do not; not at all.

Senator Roblin: Well, then, produce it.

Hon. C. William Doody: On a supplementary, if I may, honourable senators. On February 18 I asked the same question of the honourable senator, and at page 1756 of the Hansard of that day he committed himself. I asked about the availability of the outside consultant's report, and asked if the document could be made available. The honourable senator said:

> —yes, that becomes part of public information after it is completed.

I assume now that the honourable senator is reaffirming that commitment.

Senator Olson: The answer I gave on February 17 begins as follows:

Honourable senators, I should like to respond to questions raised by Senators Doody, Roblin, Manning and Donahoe on February 11—

So it is all included.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

MEETINGS BETWEEN MINISTER OF STATE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT AND PREMIER OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the same minister, and it has to do with the meetings he held in Newfoundland with Premier Peckford. After reading the report, it appears they get along so pleasantly that it is getting dangerous. I am wondering if I could list the few requests made by Premier Peckford having to do with the development of the Lower Churchill; the problem of access of surplus power across Quebec to other provinces and to the U.S.; the upgrading of the TransCanada highway; the trans-Labrador highway; improvement of a secondary road network in Labrador and Newfoundland; the revitalization of the Newfoundland railway, and other small items.

Since these requests have been made repeatedly, I wonder whether the minister would be prepared to make a statement as to the attitude of the government towards these requests. When will the review process of the requests be made? How soon can he make a statement to the Senate as to what the government action on these matters will be?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, it was my view that it was a very useful and indeed, as my honourable friend has described, pleasant meeting with Premier Peckford in Newfoundland.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: I am not surprised that it was so, because the ministers of the other provincial governments I have visited have also been very courteous, and we have had very useful discussions with them.

However, to answer the question about these specific items is, of course, asking me to make announcements for and on behalf of other ministers, and I have tried to make it clear on at least 10 or 12 occasions that I am not going to make announcements for and on behalf of the Minister of Transport on highways, or the minister responsible for DREE, or anyone else. However, I can give my honourable friend this undertaking, that as rapidly as possible I will bring that information to the attention of the Senate, after the ministers directly responsible have made an announcement.

HONOURABLE H. A. OLSON, P.C.

THE CONSTITUTION—PARTICIPATION IN DEBATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development arising out of his speech yesterday, which I qualified at that time, and I am not withdrawing one word.

[Senator Olson.]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): You ought to; that was a bad comment at the end of the speech.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but I am not withdrawing anything.

Senator Perrault: Unrepentant.

Senator Flynn: Unrepentant, yes; that's for sure.

Senator Roblin: He has not sinned; he does not need to repent. The sinner is over there.

Senator Flynn: I have two questions. My first is: Since the minister has tied all those who oppose the constitutional package of the government with those who opposed the Canadian flag over the years, going back to 1945, when Mr. Mackenzie King wanted the Red Ensign as the Canadian flag—and Senator Olson did not mention that—I want to know if the honourable minister would tell us how he voted in the flag debate in 1964.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will have to look that up. As I recall, I think I voted in favour of the resolution, but, of course, I was in the opposition then. I must look it up. There may have been some extraneous reasons why I did not vote for the flag that I am very proud of today.

Senator Flynn: You could check. My own checking shows that you voted against, but, of course, you were a member of the Social Credit Party at that time. You have wavered in some respects since then.

Senator Olson: No, no; I have improved.

Senator Flynn: My second question is: You also tied the opponents of the package to those who opposed the Citizenship Act. The word you used yesterday was the "old" Tory line. If you check into the record you will see that that bill was passed unanimously on second and third reading, and that there were only two members who spoke against it—they were marginal members of the House, I would say, of the type that could be found in the Liberal ranks at that time.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I was very surprised yesterday when I was making my speech as to how exercised the Leader of the Opposition got, because I was not accusing him—although under provocation he did get me to say something about the "old Tory line." I think perhaps I would even take that back, if that would make him feel better. What I was trying to establish with the historical record was that every time there is a great debate involving very important issues, such as the legal right to call yourself a Canadian citizen, there are those who insist that it is not the right time to do it, that it is divisive. However, the point is that I am glad that the party I now belong to has always been on the right side of those great debates.

Senator Flynn: Well, I am glad that the honourable minister has said that. However, if he would check into the record of the citizenship debate to which he referred yesterday, he might find that Mr. Diefenbaker moved an amendment suggesting that we needed a Bill of Rights, and that the Liberal Party rejected it.

Senator Olson: I would think that the best piece of advice I could give my honourable friend, in response, is that he take Mr. Diefenbaker's view now and support a constitutional amendment which will have a Bill of Rights in it.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: On a point of order, I might say I do not know if I voted, because I was Deputy Speaker at that time, but it was Mr. Diefenbaker who moved the introduction and adoption of the Bill of Rights. There is quite a difference between a Bill of Rights and entrenchment, and my honourable friend knows that. It is only a smoke screen for the government to say that we need a Bill of Rights at this time.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend has forgotten some of the debate he must have heard, whether he was Deputy Speaker or not, because certainly Mr. Diefenbaker at that time wanted a Bill of Rights which would be applicable across this country and in both the provincial and federal jurisdictions. There was no question but that he was in favour of having it apply across the country. That is what is going into the entrenchment in the Constitution now. I am surprised that my honourable friend would not enthusiastically support it.

Senator Flynn: I am supporting it, but I am saying that you are misrepresenting the case, because Mr. Diefenbaker would not impose that bill on the provinces.

Senator Olson: No, but he wanted it.

Senator Flynn: Well, so do I favour that. Don't think you are alone. You are not alone.

Senator Smith: We wanted it, but we refrained from breaking the law to get it.

Hon. Robert Muir: A supplementary to the honourable gentleman. On page 1851 of yesterday's Hansard, during the controversy between Senator Olson and the Leader of the Opposition, Senator Olson said:

> Honourable senators, there is something else that I hold higher than that, and that is Canadian citizenship.

I think he made a good statement; I see nothing wrong with it. However, I would like to ask him: Does he not realize that there are those of us who sit in this chamber and in other chambers who did not have the privilege of being born in Canada, but selected Canada, are proud of Canada, and are every bit as good a Canadian as he ever might be? He has no right to wrap himself in the robes of purity and sanctity and make out that he is the only great Canadian. There are those of us who are not fortunate enough to have been born here, but we have made Canada our home and we are as proud of Canada as he is.

● (1500)

Senator Olson: I am very pleased to hear that comment.

THE ESTIMATES

EMBARGO ON PUBLICATION OF INFORMATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I was asked to provide a prompt reply to a question asked earlier today as to whether the house leader in the other place had stated that he had considered the embargo to be lifted. I have ascertained that the house leader, the Honourable Yvon Pinard, made no such statement, and I am now rather mystified about the murky sources of information available to the opposition forces in the chamber. Perhaps I am entitled to ask a question: Where did such a distorted question originate?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): It is normal for them to have murky sources of information.

EDUCATION

FEDERAL GRANTS TO POST-SECONDARY INSTITUTIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Macquarrie asked questions on January 29 and February 12 regarding continued federal financial support for post-secondary education. On several occasions he has expressed his concern in this regard.

As honourable senators are aware, it is the intention of the government to examine closely programs involving transfers to the provinces, including fiscal arrangements as provided for in the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977. These provisions are subject to amendment beginning in 1982 and to termination with three years' notice. It is perfectly normal, therefore, that the government begin to give consideration to this matter.

As the Prime Minister stated in his press conference of February 12, 1981, the government is not considering any particular course of action at this time such as the elimination of $1.5 billion over a period of three years as it has been rumoured.

It was with the intent to provide members of all parties with a forum for their views on federal-provincial fiscal arrangements that the government established a parliamentary task force to study the matter. There will be opposition representatives on that task force. Honourable senators, programs that this committee will examine include the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977. The federal contribution to post-secondary education is included in this act. The examination will, of course, be carried out in the context of the government's expenditure plan as set out in the October 28, 1980 budget.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, pursuant to what we might call the "Roblin formula", is it agreed that we now proceed to Order No. 4? If Senator Roblin does not want to accept the credit for it, then I will.

Senator Perrault: The "Flynn initiative."

Senator Frith: Is it agreed that we now proceed to Order No. 4?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I appreciate this invocation of the "Roblin formula." It may be a hazardous formula, and referred to as such only this once.

As honourable senators may know, or at least one or two may recall, I have spoken at an earlier stage of this constitutional discussion—that is, when we were considering the establishment of the special joint committee on November 3. I will not, of course—because it would be unparliamentary, impolite and rather stupid—repeat anything I said in those days, and because I assume they will all be remembered. The one thing I will not guarantee, however, is how long I will speak.

Senator Perrault: Is that your speech on the desk?

Senator Macquarrie: Yes, those are my rough notes. Since that event of November 3, some new element has entered into this procedure. The other day I read that one of the joint chairmen of the joint committee told the press that the parallel debate is expected to be shorter and more peaceful in the Senate than in the House of Commons. The committee joint chairman, Senator Hays, said, "Our people are pretty well in favour of the package and, seeing that we are a long way from the bathroom facilities, and considering the age of those in the opposition, we will whip them pretty fast."

That causes me to be careful. I look at poor old Senator Nurgitz over there; i look at this decrepit seatmate of mine, Senator Balfour; and then, of course, upon the venerable Senator Murray, and I wonder in what kind of a group I have been placed, considering, as I must, that we must face that beardless youth, Senator Hays, over there! His comment may have been interesting, but it was not particularly elegant and I am not even sure it will go down as dry humour. However, in case there is some organization, some Hays' office which gives credit to members who can sit in the chamber for long periods of time, I should like it to be recorded that I have been here now for 78 minutes waiting while my diligent colleagues sought—in vain, mostly, may I say—to get an intelligent response from the government. I have at least one bar to whatever medal I may receive from Senator Hays.

However, even more important than this situation, which is not always trifling, I wonder if we should not carefully reflect on what has happened, not only since my momentous speech, but since this Constitution debate, in its early phase, began. What has taken place in the intervening weeks? Are there developments upon which we can reflect which might change the attitude, not only of myself but of other Canadians and of senators and members of the other place?

A good deal has happened since November 3, honourable senators. The committee was duly established and it will be recalled—and I do not wish to be chauvinistic or boastful, but we must recall, in fairness, that this side of the house, this small group of gallant senators, did help in the formation of that committee, its composition, and its procedure. This group was effective, and it is to its credit that it was.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macquarrie: The government reversed itself and allowed TV cameras in to permit the people of Canada to see the proceedings. They did observe in great numbers, and that is to the credit of the Canadian people and perhaps to the surprise of some politicians. I believe the ratings were very good—some were stars.

While waiting for another speaking engagement in Charlottetown a few weeks ago, I turned on the television to see my parliamentary brothers. I saw my good friend, the Honourable Bryce Mackasey, during one of the wrap-up sessions—as Senator Tremblay will remember—speaking about the fact that he had never served on a joint committee before and had never tackled these problems of parliamentary matters with members of the Senate. He said that the people of Canada were very fortunate to have the parliamentarians from this particular body. He said that one aspect of constitutional reform he had abandoned after his experience on the joint committee was the suggestion of a reformed or altered Senate. I was very glad I had that few minutes to watch because I agreed with him 100 per cent.

I must pay tribute to the members of the joint committee. It was a major service that they rendered, and an onerous duty that they performed. Senator Tremblay, magnificently well versed, brilliant in his exposition, combined not only the status of a great parliamentarian but also a magnificent resource person in the one being. Senator Roblin, an outstanding provincial premier, as he is now an outstanding national legislator, served on the committee. Senator Asselin, a friend of mine for many years, very knowledgeable about the country, about the world, in particular his own province, also served on that committee. I am not suggesting that only the three Conservative senators were performing well, but I do have a partiality for them. There were excellent performances by other members and I, as one who was on that committee, although not very often, thought, Calvinist though I was and am, that it was a tremendous burden that these permanent members bore. There were endless, long meetings and, sometimes, I would say, tedious meetings.

Because of the good manners and the good procedures of the committee, the night Honourable Angus MacLean presented a most excellent, reasonable and helpful brief, I had the honour of asking the first question. All the sessions which I was able to watch on TV or in person made me very proud of our people, our Senate and the House of Commons.

These three were supported by those of us who were invited from time to time. I remember one particular day when the Conservative staff were so concerned that our strength be maintained that Senator Yuzyk and I figuratively landed in the same chair. There was no serious incident, but we all agreed that the committee was magnificently manned that day! It had supernumerary strength.

Our leader, Jacques Flynn, was supportive and inspirational throughout. Behind it all, there was someone else from my party who gave strength and direction. He has given it not only since November 3 but since this matter was first brought, in its new form, to the Canadian people by the Prime Minister. I refer to a man who is often underestimated, and examined for trifling things and overlooked for major things. I am speaking of the Right Honourable Joe Clark, the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macquarrie: Those in this vain profession of politics do not like to confess the slightest portion of fallibility, but I was concerned that the leader of the party, Mr. Clark, was being a bit too strong in the position he took in October. I did not think he was wrong, but I thought perhaps his emphasis was a bit strong. I have been proven wrong and he has been proven right, because what has happened in the intervening months has shown that his perception was sound. We used to read that one of the most important people in all this was not the Prime Minister of Canada or the Minister of Justice, but the Premier of Saskatchewan, that he was uniquely qualified to be a catalyst and an outstandingly perceptive interpreter, and that his support was absolutely the sine qua non of a proper solution.

Senator Frith: We used to say the same thing about Judas.

Senator Macquarrie: He troubled himself for months, from Regina to Ottawa to Honolulu. This Hamlet of the prairies took month after month, almost a full gestation period, to come up with something. He came up with the exact view which the Right Honourable Joe Clark arrived at after 90 minutes of consideration in October.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macquarrie: I will not criticize the Premier of Saskatchewan because I do not know him at all. Therefore, how could I dislike him. Also, he is a maritimer so he cannot be all bad. However, I have noticed that there is a great deal of foolish image-building taking place. I wonder if he might not be an example.

But more important than the conversion of the odd Saul as he traipses along to Honolulu instead of Damascus is what has happened to the people. I am one of those Conservatives who reads the Gallup polls, usually with a great deal of pain and always with a bit of fear. However, I see that now the public opinion polls are also reading the issues as did the Leader of the Opposition. That fact should be entered into the evaluation of who today is significant, who is indispensible and who, in fact, is possessed of the qualities of leadership.

It has been a long process, honourable senators. There has been a multitude of briefs and a variety of suggestions. But I still wonder, and I say this with trepidation in the presence of hardworking committee members such as I see here—Senators Lamontagne, Roblin and Tremblay—whether, in fact, even yet, there was enough examination, enough discussion. I am not a father of the church so I have no right to ask for confession, but if I asked how many senators here read every word of the briefs, would I have an overwhelming crowd saying yes? If there were, I would not be in it because I did miss one or two paragraphs.

Despite the dedication of the committee, their hard work and the changes—and some of them are probably improvements—are we really through? Is the job done? Have we analyzed and scrutinized or reflected sufficiently? I heard my old friend, Senator Denis, speak the other night. I have a great regard for him because he very often hits the nail on the head. I know that he feels that people have had enough and would like to get it over with. That is a human reaction. If I could ever get to the stage where I would never hear the foolish words "the feds" again, I would be very happy. It is a most disgusting expression which now fills the mouths of our pressmen and sometimes our politicians. There is that tendency.

However, if we were to think a little more on the matter, I believe we would conclude we have not, in fact, finished the job. I am not suggesting that the committee did not discharge its mandate; I refer to the job of the country. I thought from the beginning, and I am more convinced than ever, that we should send nothing over to the United Kingdom but the first page or two, and that we should ask for nothing but repatriation, which is the proper word, and an amending formula. I have thought all along that these other inclusions should be left here, and that they require more profound, serious and sustained study.

It has been my view, and I do not know who else has had the same view, that somewhere along the line we should have turned this matter over to a constitutional convention and allowed the government to make an effort to govern. We should have put this matter on the kind of process which we once used in the old days, when it was safe to throw out the expression "royal commission". But a constitutional convention would be much more important, much more carefully structured and much more thorough in its job.

I do not believe that we have finished. Am I the only one who hears murmurings of dissatisfaction? Are the native people satisfied with regard to their interests, their claims, their anxieties and their fears? They are not. How is it viewed in the Province of Quebec? Outside the federal Liberal Party, I cannot find people there who say that this has been well done or that the essential values of that province have been looked at, guaranteed or indeed properly understood.

Just the other day the St. Thomas Aquinas Society expressed the concern of the Acadian people, and I am sure that my colleague, Senator Fournier, knows that very well. Today, a spokesman for the francophones outside Quebec expressed concern and dissatisfaction. And need I mention what the women said with great clarity and very definitely?

Do we have to confine ourselves to these select groups? The six opposing provinces were joined today by the seventh most senior province of them all, Nova Scotia, which had the first legislative assembly in this country. I cannot exactly describe the position of Saskatchewan, but it is certainly not for this package. The premier of that province is certainly among the premiers who are the nay-sayers. Eight out of 10 provinces certainly strikes me as a fairly formidable negative expression.

So there is reason for pause, for thought and for the people to ask: Despite all the hard work of these very fine people, is the job done? Do we put on a forced draft and closure in certain places and rush that thing over to the United Kingdom so there is some personal satisfaction for some individual?

But more important even than the premiers is the public. As I read and try to understand the samplings of Canadian public opinion, I must conclude that the people of Canada are repelled by the processes which have been put in vogue to bring about a Constitution for this country. It is small wonder that the Prime Minister of us all, the leader of all the Canadas, invokes a highly unappealing suggestion when he says, "Let them hold their noses and take it." Is this a great occasion on which to build a new Canada? Is that an atmosphere through which we pass?

I hear people talking about it being an historic occasion. There have been some fine speeches and some exceptionally fine speeches, but not all the oratory from Demosthenes to today can make of a bad situation a glorious occasion. Why are we here? Why is the public negative? Why are the other jurisdictions distressed? It is simply because a few very basic and early detected things have continued.

● (1520)

None of the reasons for this attitude comes as a surprise. They are very simple. They have been talked about with strength and with vigour and with clarity. There should be nobody in the country surprised. First, of course—more poignant today than when the debate began but clearly there when the debate began—is the usurpation of authority by one level of government in areas which are not its alone. It is as clear as crystal. That is the reason.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macquarrie: It may be quaint for me to mention the British North America Act, but I do. It did certain things. In 1867 the British North America Act gave the provinces the right to amend their constitutions, saving one thing, and that is the office of the lieutenant governor. The federal authority suffered for a good many years before it had an equal right, and it was not until 1949, B.N.A. Act No. 2, that the federal government received the right to amend its Constitution in those matters which were clearly and exclusively federal.

Young though I was, I can remember vividly Prime Minister St. Laurent talking to the people on radio. He said it was as if there were two families living in two apartments under one roof. He did not say "in a duplex," because that was not a term in vogue then, but he said "living in two apartments under one roof." He said that one had the right to make any redecorations or alterations it liked without any consultation, while the one adjoining had to make consultations and had to check with the landlord. He said, "We have straightened out that anomaly. We have made them equal in that regard."

So as of 1949 the federal authority has the right to what is exclusively federal; since 1867 the provincial authorities have had the right to those things which are exclusively provincial. Clearly and definitely, without having to be an LLD or a bachelor of jurisprudence to perceive it, what is left is shared by the two, and neither the provincial nor the federal can unilaterally move into those which are left. And there are a lot left. Of course, there are a lot left. In a federal society and a dynamic society there are bound to be a lot left, and when you find one level of government moving in on those, naturally, trouble is bound to follow.

It is not only the lawyers who can see where we are today. This failure to recognize, or, perhaps putting it more bluntly, this unwillingness to admit, has caused our anguish; has brought about stalemate. Would any Canadian be happy to see the provinces taking the federal government to court? That would be an invidious situation.

I am not one of those who believe the provinces are supreme. I am not a bleeding-heart provincial-rights man at all. But more important than anyone's preferences is the preservation of the federal state, which requires two jurisdictions recognizing each other's right to hold those jurisdictions.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macquarrie: That is the thing. In the face of this tension, this disruption, what, surely, is the role of the leader of a federal government? Is it to make these matters worse or is it to assuage them, to diminish the tensions? Which, now, of these courses would be the more likely, if he wanted to build a strong, united country? To ask the question, immediately dictates the answer.

But our trouble today is that the person with the most authority has exactly the opposite idea. He does not want to go down in history as the great conciliator. He wants to be, and is being, the great exacerbater.

Don't ask for my interpretation. Senator Olson was talking about interpretations, but I would not presume to interpret the Prime Minister of Canada. I go to what he himself said. I read from an article by Iain Hunter, Citizen national editor. This article appeared in the Citizen on February 20:

> Prime Minister Trudeau admitted Thursday he is dividing Canadians by pushing through his constitutional reforms.

He's not sorry about it, he declared—in some cases he finds it "exhilarating."

Exhilarating!

Trudeau told more than 200 cheering Liberal supporters that if the country breaks apart in five or 50 years because of his unilateral action to patriate the constitution with an entrenched charter of rights and his own amending formula, "then I say it wasn't worthy of living another day."

Trudeau also said he would "relish" an election on the constitutional issue after patriation in one to four years . . .

He boasted he had "managed to split" both Conservatives and New Democrats in the Commons "down the middle" on the issue.

Down the middle! I think in the House of Commons there are 102 Conservative members, and one has voted for the package. Now that is the middle. But is "relish" what we want? "Relish" and "division"?

Honourable senators, let us reflect on that. Is that the role of the Prime Minister? It is, of course, up to the Prime Minister to enjoy what he likes; to have his views. He is a man who has already made his mark in history. There is no doubt about that. History, of course, will make its final appraisal of him, on how at this crucial time he measured up. All I can say is that I am glad that in the formative years of this country John A. Macdonald had a different view from that. His idea was that you diminish these differences rather than exacerbate them. And he was called the great conciliator.

I cannot find in history any great leader of this country, in the Dominion, who found divisiveness exhilarating—or, if he did, he didn't say so. Our leaders believed that in their role as Prime Minister of the whole country they had a special responsibility for holding that country together. In that, these former Prime Ministers were far closer to St. Ignatius, the Bishop of Antioch, who said, "Shun divisions as the beginnings of evils." That is just to show you that a Presbyterian can toss out the odd saint from time to time. I don't want to start a theological argument, but it was the Bishop of Antioch, Senator Roblin. You are correct.

Now I would like honourable senators to know—and it is not for Senator Hays' reasons—that I will not lay about on all the issues I can think of, but the second one of immense importance to me is that in what might appear as a seemingly contradictory thing, that having usurped the authority of the provinces in their legitimate fields, the same government has done quite the opposite in a contradictory turn, having laid upon the British government and Parliament unwanted responsibility, giving them a far greater role than they desire or deserve, or possess in fact.

From the very beginning—and that is the one thing I do repeat from November 3, because the attitude has not changed—from the very beginning I felt humiliated that another Parliament was doing what should be done in the parliamentary institutions of my country. That must hit any thoughtful Canadian as the first and most undesirable aspect of the whole operation. In our free and sovereign country we have a foreign Parliament doing what they wouldn't do in 1868, and being asked to do it by our government.

Shame, I say! Shame! I was humiliated before and now I am burdened by vicarious shame. It is not enough to have my own country torn by strife, region against region, province against province; rancor increasing, disagreement abounding. We have to carry that on to the international scene now, and be seen as fools by the international community.

What an exercise we are going through in this process. Is anyone in Canada proud of all this leaking of documents? The leakage would make Niagara look like a timid stream. If you are leaking all over the place, at least the sprinklers aren't working and probably something else is far worse. Contradiction after contradiction. Somebody laying blame for what some other fellow did not say in a secret document, and then someone exposing what he said to someone else who did not say it. Someone going across the Atlantic this way, and someone going across that way. "We did say it." "We did not say it." "We only talked to her for seven minutes, and made it all clear."

• (1530)

How degrading! How embarrassing! Two great sovereign countries going through a tangled web like this. Confusion upon complexity! Complexity upon a morass of indignity! All this in the name of achieving a certain document by a certain time.

Of all the weird episodes in this affair, I think that the one involving the British High Commissioner, if not the most important—which it may not be—is clearly the most ridiculous. What a furore! I cannot talk about what goes on in the other place, but that is not going to stop me from talking about what I read in the newspapers and see on television. I read and watch the media, and with respect to this matter what an awesome story I saw unfolding.

Two members of a certain political party go to Rideau Hall—usually a harmless place and a fine place—to a skating party, where, we hear, they talk to an Englishman, who later indicates he is, in fact, the British High Commissioner. He talks to them. Then these members report to their leader. They go right to the top on a matter of this seriousness. The said leader goes into action right away and also goes right to the top. He goes to the House of Commons and talks to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. "Take note of this very serious thing. This Englishman, who is actually the High Commissioner, has actually sought to influence these two men."

And what happens? Instead of being laughed at, in good humour, as we would do in this place, an investigation of this serious piece of conversational imperialism is ordered. The fearful apparatus attendant upon a state inquiry goes into its fearful process.

Senator Flynn: The fighting Secretary of State!

Senator Macquarrie: Then the verdict is handed down—not too long after, a bit faster than usual. There is no declaration of war, no severance of diplomatic relations, but what headlines this bit of conversation causes to emerge.

> 'Beyond' normal role: British envoy's knuckles rapped for interference.
> External Affairs Minister Mark MacGuigan pronounced British High Commissioner Sir John Ford guilty of interference in Canadian domestic affairs Monday but let him off with a suspended sentence.

There were, you see, honourable senators, extenuating circumstances:

> —because the high commissioner is scheduled to retire in a few months anyway.

What headlines! What foolish degradation! What hyperbolic poppycock the whole thing was!

I am not here to comment upon these men, who felt themselves to be intellectually assailed and their honour exposed at the skating party, which was clearly one of the most dangerous social episodes since Aunt Dinah's quilting party. Anyway, they were all upset.

I am not going to hold myself up as an example, but in my early days here, as a little lad from Prince Edward Island, when all of you were very young, I never really felt endangered on the diplomatic circuit. We know that diplomats are supposed to be diplomatic, but they do not really make much of an impression if they confine themselves to banalities and comments about the weather. I, perhaps wrongly, thought it was something of a compliment if an ambassador or a high commissioner extended to me the courtesy of his candour, to which I thought the response was supposed to be confidentiality, and that in that way you might learn something. Perhaps I was living in a fool's paradise. Perhaps I was being intellectually plundered and did not know it.

Now, I try never to be one-sided in my criticisms. I think, with all due respect, that the British High Commissioner was ill-advised to confuse the issue further by holding a press conference, and I think his own government was either absentminded or a bit stupid to choose that particular moment to announce the name of his successor. That added to all the foolishness that was going on at that time.

It is a bizarre situation. I almost expect from time to time, to see a press conference given by the Duke of Plaza Toro, since this is clearly Gilbert and Sullivan, if not Lewis Carroll's Alice in Wonderland. Perhaps some good Canadian, some day, if he writes a dirty enough script, might get a Canada Council grant for it, and will do something with it along those lines. I do not suppose that what who said to whom at that skating party is at all important. As old as I am, when I go to that skating party at Their Excellencies', I tend to skate, and that surprises many there into lack of speech. I do go, though.

But what is significant here, honourable senators, is that a government would take this charade and erect it into the status of international, intergovernmental communication. That is awful.

[Senator Flynn.]

What have we in this country? This country, a charter member of the United Nations, as it was of the League of Nations. Can we imagine our former Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, the godfather of the Commonwealth, in the fine sense of the word, and a respected member of the international community, dealing with such tittle-tattle as this sort of thing? O tempora! O mores! What have we come to in our restless strivings?

In this affair, of course, the press is no better than it usually is. One remembers what Adlai Stevenson said when he spoke to the National Association of Newspaper Editors. He said, "I know you are important. It is your job to separate the wheat from the chaff and then publish the chaff." There is a lot of chaff being published. They are majoring in minors much of the time. They would never be able to behave that way, of course, if they did not have such assistance from the government.

I even read that someone thought it worthwhile to develop the hysteria about the Canadian High Commissioner in London, Mrs. Wadds—who, I hear from all sides, is an outstanding occupant of that office—and said, "She was saying that you should use the Telex for important communications." This was something new. She was charging the British with snooping. They were spying, she was supposed to have said. We all get the External Affairs telephone directory every two months, and what do we find up here in the corner? "Warning. Classified information shall not be discussed on the telephone." A news item? Nonsense. Nonsense.

To make the whole thing even broader, the Secretary General of the Commonwealth was brought in. Should Britain and Canada, after all their years of association, need an interlocutor to enable them to talk to one another? It is totally unnecessary and very, very deplorable.

This whole affair would have been avoided, honourable senators, had the British had before them, as they should have had before them, nothing but a request for patriation with an amending formula. That is the great error.

There are many things that should cause us to be concerned, honourable senators. I heard Mr. Chrétien's speech. I admire him. I like him. I think that he himself is a very sincere man, trying to do his best. He closed, however, with something that possibly revealed another little area of trouble that we get into these days. He said he wanted a Constitution for tomorrow, and a modern one. Modernity is very much worshipped in our society. Perhaps it is too much worshipped. We think that if we can just get something new—in this case, a new Constitution—everything will be all right. People who have never read the British North America Act and do not know what is in it say that we must get something new. If you ask them why, they say, "We must have something new. We must have something new for today."

I am not one of those hidebound Tories who think that everything that is old is good. I am not dancing in the streets because there is supposed to be a new Conservative push on now. I am not nearly as happy as Frank Sinatra is about the American election. That is their business, of course. I was in the United States on a speaking tour, which just happened to end on the day of the inauguration. When I am abroad I am fairly polite, but I did have going through my mind the comment of Sir Robert Walpole when the British almost danced in the streets—you cannot expect them to get too excited. They almost danced in the streets when the War of the Spanish Succession opened, and old Walpole said: "They're ringing the bells now; they'll be wringing their hands soon." So I wonder what will happen down south. We will have to leave it to them.

But, honourable senators, we so often get carried away with the importance of that which is new. I would not be in this party if the word "Progressive" was not there and it was not a progressive party. But those things which are progressive, which are modern, are not always better. They are not always right. If we were a society of lemmings, the most progressive guy would be the one over the cliff first. That's who it would be. That is not a good example. So we get lost in some of these things and it sounds not terribly important. But if we combine these ingredients, and if, in an effort which is hailed as a great new chapter of our national experience, we exacerbate and extend those things which divide us; if we turn Canadian against Canadian; if we put excessive strain upon our institutions, then being modern will not be very helpful for the people of tomorrow—not at all helpful.

We must ask ourselves a question, which is: Do we really, in our innermost thoughts, believe that what we propose will make a better Canada? Not new institutions, not new names, not personal satisfaction for any one Canadian, no matter how exalted, but will it make a better Canada; has it the ingredients for improving our nation, making it stronger and more united?

We do not need anyone to encourage disunity. The elements of that have been there from the very beginning, and our great statesmen have troubled over it and tried to hold it back. On this question, I find that today I stand where I stood before: I cannot, in all conscience, in honour, dignity, or love of my country, support that which I know is inherently wrong, and I must oppose it to the end.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I will certainly not try to be as entertaining as Senator Macquarrie. Even if I tried, I am sure that I would not succeed. I would like to note, however, that in his defence of the provinces he invoked with great admiration the name of Sir John A. Macdonald. I am not too sure, however, if the honourable senator remembers how Sir John A. defined Canadian federalism. I have here a quote that we inserted in our report to the Senate last November. Sir John said that he wanted to join our five peoples into one nation "with the local governments and local legislatures subordinated to the general government and legislatures." I am not sure if Senator Macquarrie would accept the concept and the definition of Canadian federalism enunciated by Sir John A. Macdonald.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, after many others, I should like to congratulate Senator Hays and Mr. Serge Joyal, co-chairmen of the joint committee. Some have called them the "odd couple". I, for one, feel that they complemented each other and that they very successfully carried out duties that were both difficult and thankless. I should also like to thank my colleagues Senator Lafond and Senator Rousseau who so often replaced me on the committee.

This debate is indeed important, but we should not unduly dramatize it, especially in this chamber of sober second thought. On February 12, I was very glad to hear Senator Flynn urge this chamber to show reason and moderation. I have seen my country survive too many of these so-called last chances to be impressed now by references to a coup d'état which, according to some, would mean the end of Canadian federalism, and according to others, including Jean Ethier-Blais, the end of the French presence in America. I remember that in 1964, some people were saying that the Canadian flag would become a symbol of division in this country, that it represented the betrayal of Canada and the rejection of our Christian heritage. I hope that during this debate, we shall try, in this place at least, to demonstrate more serenity and moderation.

The centrifugal forces have always been strong in Canada. Almost as soon as Confederation was born, as you know, Nova Scotia favoured secession. When he started his election campaign in 1896, Sir Wilfrid Laurier spent a good part of his speech in Quebec City exposing the separatist movement and what he called then "la Laurentie". In 1935, Henri Bourassa mentioned that the four western provinces could separate and create their own confederation. About the same time, the Honourable Ian Mackenzie, from British Columbia, who was later to become a minister in the King government, stated that the separatist movement was gaining much momentum in his province. I recall these events to show that the tensions that exist today are not new, and that Canada has survived and developed despite the extreme centrifugal forces which have exerted themselves throughout our history.

I do not intend today to get into the specifics of the resolution because, except for some elements that I could probably deal with at a later date, there is a fairly widespread consensus as to the substance of the resolution. Instead, I would like to deal with the process involved, because that is what is at issue.

I shall refer in my analysis to those statements made by politicians and constitutional experts. At my suggestion, some of these were quoted last week in the other place. I do not think it would be redundant to read them into our own record.

My argument is that the resolution does not change the federal-provincial balance in a way which is unfavourable to the provinces. I do recognize however that several sections deal with provincial jurisdictions and that as such, if the resolution were presented as a bill, it would clearly be unconstitutional. But that is not the issue here.

Another question poses itself: does this unilateral action violate the Constitution or some constitutional convention? I do not think there is any constitutional provision to prevent the Canadian Parliament from passing this resolution which, in itself, has no de jure validity.

● (1550)

[English]

In other words, there is no legal requirement and no binding convention that prevents the Canadian Parliament from adopting, without the consent of the provinces, a joint resolution asking the United Kingdom Parliament to amend the B.N.A. Act, even with respect to matters affecting federal-provincial relationships or provincial powers.

The situation seems to be clear with respect to the lack of a strict legal requirement. Even in 1935, Professor W. P. M. Kennedy, appearing before the Special Committee on the British North America Act, said about the amendment process:

> —I do not think there is the slightest necessity in law for the Parliament of Canada to consult the provinces in the process. It may be very good politics, but politics is not the law. I think the Parliament of Canada can present any address to the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

Professor Norman Rogers, who became a minister in the King government, appearing before the same committee, held a similar view that consulting the provinces was not a matter of legal right, but a question of political expediency.

Professor Gil Rémillard of Laval University, although opposed to the resolution, stated before the special joint committee on the Constitution on January 9, 1981:

> In fact, you have the powers to do whatever you want as members of Parliament, as members of the two houses of Parliament of Canada.

Senator Flynn: And afterwards the Supreme Court said no.

Senator Lamontagne:

> You have the power to declare unilaterally that Canada now has a new Constitution, and I can see no legal argument that could be brought to bear to stop you from doing that.

But is there a convention requiring the consent of the provinces before an Address is adopted by the Canadian Parliament and sent to the United Kingdom? Constitutional authorities differ as to what constitutes a convention.

Professor Peter Hogg has probably expressed the prevailing view when he stated that a convention becomes established as a result of, first, a long standing invariable practice, and, second, a belief by the officials, to whom it applies, that the practice is obligatory.

The first question, therefore, is: Has the consent of the provinces become a long standing practice? Professor Gérard V. La Forest answered this question when he appeared before the special joint committee on January 9, 1981. He said:

> First, the precedents offer only limited support. A good number of amendments have been made without such consent, sometimes without consultation. It is true that there has been a strong tendency not to seek amendments altering the division of power between the two levels of government without such consent, but several amendments that affected the position of the provinces did not receive provincial consent. Even the very delicate question of the boundary between Quebec and Newfoundland was constitutionally defined without Quebec's consent. Moreover, the manner in which the consent of the provinces was expressed denotes a vagueness that even in conventions is not common, and a fortiori certainly not common to rules of law. Sometimes the legislatures consent—and sometimes the Premiers—and I get the feeling in a few cases that a Premier may have accepted something, but he was far from agreeing with it.

It is highly doubtful, therefore, that the seeking of the consent of the provinces has become a long standing practice. What about the second condition that there should be a belief by the officials to whom it applies that the practice is obligatory? It is true that, over the years, some officials concerned have believed that provincial consent was obligatory. But this belief was far from being unanimous. I will give a few recent illustrations to justify this statement.

In 1940, when the resolution asking the United Kingdom Parliament to transfer unemployment insurance from provincial to federal jurisdiction was debated in the House of Commons, the following exchange took place:

> MR. THORSON: . . . but I would not wish this debate to conclude with an acceptance, either direct or implied, of the doctrine that it is necessary to obtain the consent of the provinces before an application is made to amend the British North America Act. Fortunately, this is an academic question at this time.

Mr. Lapointe, who was the Minister of Justice at that time, replied:

> May I tell my hon. friend that neither the Prime Minister nor I have said that it is necessary, but it may be desirable.

Reference has often been made to a document entitled Amendment to the Constitution of Canada, published in 1964 by the Honourable Guy Favreau, then Minister of Justice for Canada. Such reference has usually been made in an attempt to prove that the consent of the provinces has become a binding convention. This publication, basing itself on past practices, lists four rules or principles that govern the procedure for amending the Constitution. It states:

> The fourth general principle is that the Canadian Parliament will not request an amendment directly affecting federal-provincial relationships without prior consultation and agreement with the provinces. This principle did not emerge as early as others, but since 1907, and particularly since 1930, has gained increasing recognition and acceptance.

It should be noted that the document does not say that the fourth principle has gained recognition but only increasing recognition and acceptance. Those who invoke this document to prove that there is a convention often forget to mention the last sentence of the same paragraph. It reads as follows:

> The nature and the degree of provincial participation in the amending process, however, have not lent themselves to easy definition.

If the nature and degree of provincial participation have not lent themselves to easy definition, how can the consent of the provinces have developed into a binding convention? Finally, the document clearly indicates that this fourth principle, as well as the others, is "not constitutionally binding in any strict sense."

Senator Flynn: You were a member of the government at that time.

Senator Lamontagne: Again, that was a quote from Guy Favreau.

Senator Donahoe: Your colleague.

Senator Lamontagne: Yes, and I agree with him.

Senator Flynn: You would not have said that in those days.

Senator Lamontagne: A similar review of past practice undertaken by the Honourable Ron Basford and the Honourable Marc Lalonde in 1978 states:

> (d) the fourth observation is that, although not constitutionally obliged to do so, the Government of Canada, before asking Parliament to adopt a Joint Address, sought and obtained the consent of all the provinces on the three amendments (1940, 1951 and 1964) that involved the distribution of powers.

This view that there is no constitutional convention obliging the Canadian government to seek the consent of the provinces has been shared over the years by some provincial premiers, more particularly at the Dominion-Provincial Conference held in 1950 in another attempt to seek a Canadian amending formula. That view was then expressed very clearly by Premier McNair of New Brunswick. He said:

> —the provinces, in the final resort, are not assured of any say whatever in amendments of the Constitution, no matter how hard their interests may be affected thereby.

He went on to say:

> With these thoughts in mind, I submit that the provinces, at this stage in our constitutional development, face this situation. First, in the matter of constitutional amendments, the parliament of Canada is in effect the judge—and the sole judge—as to whether provincial rights and privileges will be affected. Second, in consequence the only protection the provinces have today against arbitrary invasion of their rights, powers and jurisdiction is the parliament of Canada itself.

● (1600)

Such statements, and others that I might quote, showing that there is not "a belief by the officials to whom it applies that the practice is obligatory", are undoubtedly the foundation of the conclusion reached by Professor La Forest before the special joint committee, when he said:

> I am skeptical about the existence of a convention . . . I am confident that it has not matured into a rule of law.

This view seems to have been confirmed, at least implicitly, by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Senate reference, when it said:

> The practice, since 1867, has been to seek amendment to the Act by a joint address of both Houses of Parliament. Consultation with one or more of the provinces has occurred in some instances.

This is not, in my view, an observation that leads to the recognition of the existence of full-blown and operative convention. The recent majority decision of the Manitoba Court of Appeal, rendered by three judges, clearly denied the existence of such a convention. A fourth judge refused to give an opinion on the ground that it did not belong to the courts, but to the political arena, to decide such an issue. By implication, therefore, that judge decided that no binding constitutional convention existed. Curiously enough, the fifth judge, the only judge who concluded that a convention existed, stated in his reasons:

> I must say that I am not sure that such precedents as exist in themselves create a constitutional convention which might be recognized by the courts as law . . . I am not wholly persuaded by one of the principal submissions made by the provinces, namely, that a convention has been established as a result of precedents.

That judge decided, in spite of these reasons, that such a convention existed.

The view that no such binding convention exists is shared by the two political parties that form the opposition in the House of Commons. The New Democratic Party supports the proposed resolution, which provides for unilateral action by the Canadian Parliament without the consent of the provinces. The Progressive Conservative Party, although opposed to the resolution, favours unilateral action by the Canadian Parliament with respect to the patriation of the Constitution and a Canadian amending formula. I conclude, therefore, that it is quite proper, in a legal or constitutional sense, for the Canadian Parliament to proceed unilaterally, without the consent of the provinces.

Senator Flynn: That is your understanding?

Senator Lamontagne: Yes, it is.

This conclusion is confirmed by Professor Frank R. Scott, who is undoubtedly one of our most eminent constitutional experts.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Lamontagne: He wrote in 1950:

> There may be political wisdom in consulting with the provinces, before adopting a joint address requesting an amendment affecting provincial rights, but there is certainly no legal necessity for doing so.

During the current Canadian debate, a second basic question has been raised regarding the position of the U.K. Parliament with respect to amendments to the B.N.A. Act. In a strict legal sense, the act of 1867 is a statute adopted by the U.K. Parliament in the exercise of its sovereignty towards its North American colonies; the British Parliament still remains the sole authority with the power to amend it and to change the modifications made to it prior to 1930. The Statute of Westminster, which granted sovereignty to the British Dominions in 1931, merely reconfirmed Canada's colonial constitutional status. Indeed, section 7(1) states:

> Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to apply to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930, or any order, rule or regulation thereunder.

In this respect, Dr. O. D. Skelton said in 1935:

> All that was sought to do in 1931 was to ensure that for the time being the status quo was not altered by the Statute of Westminster, as regards constitutional amendment.

The U.K. Parliament is, therefore, in strict law, the sole authority empowered to amend the B.N.A. Acts passed before 1930 and it could do so, in theory, in the exercise of its own sovereignty, without even prior consultation with Canada.

Senator Flynn: You say since 1949?

Senator Lamontagne: Yes, even since 1949.

Senator Flynn: It could change anything in the future.

Senator Lamontagne: It could not change the constitution of the central Parliament, but it can change all the exceptions which were inserted in section 91(1) in 1949.

Senator Flynn: That is not what you said.

Senator Lamontagne: That is what I say.

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Lamontagne: But then the following question arises: Is there a convention obliging the U.K. Parliament to amend the Constitution of Canada only on request and with the consent of the Canadian Parliament? To determine this issue according to Professor Hogg's two criteria, we must first decide if there is a long-standing practice to this effect.

The practice of amending the Constitution through an Address to the Imperial Parliament existed in the British North American colonies even before Confederation. According to Professor F. R. Scott, the existence of this old practice explains why the Fathers of Confederation did not include an amending formula in the B.N.A. Act in 1867. He says:

> —when the Fathers of Confederation met they were accustomed to the idea that the constitution could be changed and that it required no more than the presentation of an address to the Imperial Parliament . . . So that the Fathers of Confederation, having had that experience in Canada, were accustomed to that method of change.

Senator Flynn: There was no federal Parliament there then.

Senator Lamontagne: The Parliament of the United Kingdom has made 21 amendments to the B.N.A. Act since 1867. On three occasions, in 1893, 1927 and 1950, minor amendments for statute revision purposes were made on the sole initiative of the Parliament of the United Kingdom. In all other cases involving more substantial amendments, a request was made by the Government of Canada, as in 1871 and 1875, or, since then, by the Canadian Parliament. In no case has the U.K. Parliament refused an amendment because the consent of the provinces had not been obtained or accepted an amendment upon a provincial request. Furthermore, on only one occasion, in 1907, has the British Parliament made a significant change to the terms of a resolution adopted by the Canadian Parliament. The measure sought to increase federal subsidies to the provinces "as a final and unalterable settlement" but this condition was deleted in London because it was seen as "being obviously inappropriate in a legislative enactment." British Columbia opposed the Canadian request on the ground that the proposed increase in subsidies was not high enough.

This single incident in nearly 115 years, whatever interpretation is given to it, cannot be invoked to deny the existence of a long-standing practice. But what about the second requirement? Has there been a belief by the officials to whom it applies that the practice is obligatory?

It may well be argued that, while the Statute of Westminster does not apply to amendments to the B.N.A. Act, the U.K. Parliament decided implicitly and unilaterally, when it passed this statute, not to amend the act in the future except by consent of the Dominion of Canada, thereby recognizing that the long-standing practice it had followed up to then had become obligatory. We should remember that section 4 of the statute states—and I recognize that it does not apply in strict law to Canada at the moment:

> No Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the commencement of this Act shall extend or be deemed to extend, to a Dominion as part of the law of that Dominion, unless it is expressly declared in that Act that that Dominion has requested, and consented to, the enactment thereof.

Since then, successive British officials have considered that the Parliament of the United Kingdom was bound to act at the request of the Canadian Parliament. These quotations have already been referred to elsewhere, but I wish them to be inserted in the Debates of the Senate. In 1940, when the unemployment insurance amendment was being considered by the United Kingdom House of Commons, the Solicitor General stated:

> —we square the legal with the constitutional position by passing these Acts only in the form that the Canadian Parliament requires and at the request of the Canadian Parliament.

He went on to say:

> My justification to the House for this Bill—and it is important to observe this—is not on the merits of the proposal, which is a matter for the Canadian Parliament; if we were to embark upon that, we might trespass on what I conceive to be their constitutional position. The sole justification for this enactment is that we are doing in this way what the Parliament of Canada desires to do.

When Quebec objected to the 1943 amendment postponing a redistribution of the seats of the House of Commons, the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs at that time, Mr. Attlee, stated:

> I have no information as to any Province objecting, but, in any case, the matter is brought before us by an Address voted by both Houses of Parliament, and it is difficult for us to look behind that fact.

Again in 1946, when Quebec opposed an amendment changing the basis of representation in the House of Commons, Viscount Bennett, who was Prime Minister of Canada when the Statute of Westminster was approved, said in the House of Lords:

> Canada is the only one of the Dominions in which a Party majority can amend the Constitution. They cannot amend it directly but they do it indirectly, because we have agreed—

And he was speaking as a member of the House of Lords at that time.

> —that we will consent to pass any legislation that they may petition to have passed by this Parliament.

In 1949, with respect to the amendment adding section 91(1) to the B.N.A. Act, 1867, no mention was made in the British Parliament that some provinces were strongly opposed to the modification.

Senator Flynn: There was no strong opposition.

Senator Lamontagne: You can put your interpretation of that situation on the record.

The Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations said:

> The Bill is cast in the terms of the Address adopted by the Federal Parliament of Canada and, of course, we are all ready to do what they desire.

In 1960, when an amendment providing for the compulsory retirement age of 75 for superior court judges was introduced, the Minister of State for Commonwealth Relations stated:

> —legislation by the United Kingdom Parliament is still necessary where the subject of the amendment is one which affects the interests both of the Federal Parliament and the Provinces.
> We are therefore to all intents and purposes acting in what is a formal capacity for the Canadian Parliament in a matter which is solely its concern.

He went on to say:

> In accordance with long-established precedent, we refrain from discussing the merits of a Bill submitted to us amending the British North America Acts when this has been introduced in consequence of Addresses to Her Majesty adopted by both Houses of the Canadian Parliament.

Senator Flynn: We had the approval of the provinces at that time, so what you are saying is irrelevant.

Senator Lamontagne: It seems obvious, therefore, that this "long-established precedent" has become a binding convention.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Lamontagne: This view has also been held in Canada. I have already quoted a statement made to this effect by Premier McNair in 1950. The Honourable Ernest Lapointe stated in 1931:

> In that matter the Imperial Parliament is not really a dominating power; it acts as a trustee and as a guarantor, and merely gives effect to the will of the Canadian people.

In 1943, Mr. Coldwell restated the prevailing view. He said:

> I know, of course, that at present the real power of amendment of our Constitution, which is the British North America Act, is in reality in the hands of this Parliament. As I have just indicated, anything we may ask regarding amendment will be granted by the Imperial Parliament at Westminster.

Although the biased and inconsistent report recently published by the Foreign Affairs Committee of the U.K. House of Commons did not reproduce the statements of those British officials that I have quoted, it practically confirmed the prevailing view that there is a convention binding the U.K. Parliament. The report stated:

> —it would not be in accord with the established constitutional position for the U.K. Parliament . . .
> (ii) to undertake any deliberation about the suitability for the people of Canada of a requested constitutional package;
>
> (iii) to patriate the Canadian constitution unilaterally with or without a post-partriation amending formula;
> (iv) to enact a requested constitutional package with amendments not consented to by the Canadian Government and Parliament;
> (v) to fail to give a proper request priority in Parliament's time table.

The report adds that the U.K. Parliament is not bound by the so-called provincial unanimity rule, and that it would have to accept a unilateral request from the Canadian Parliament, even if this request affects the rights of the provinces, because the British government and Parliament are not "the guardians or trustees of the rights of the provinces precisely as provinces."

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

• (1620)

Senator Lamontagne: All these conclusions reached by the select committee are in accordance with long standing British practice.

However, the report goes on to say, at least implicitly, that the U.K. Parliament must reject a request from the Canadian Parliament if it affects the federal structure of Canada and if it is not supported by a majority of provinces as defined by the Victoria formula. It states:

> —if the U.K. authorities must be said to have a duty to someone, it would be a duty or responsibility to the Canadian people or community as a federally structured community—

This doctrine that the U.K. Parliament is the guardian and trustee of Canadian federalism contradicts all statements made by U.K. governments over the years. In a rather rambling argument, the select committee tries to show that this new role of the U.K. Parliament, which has no basis in our history, arose out of the Statute of Westminster in 1931. However, it contradicts itself when it says that the statute was merely designed to retain "the pre-1931 status quo, in relation to constitutional amendments".

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office summarized for the select committee the position taken by successive U.K. governments with respect to the amendment of the B.N.A. Act. It stated:

> If a request to effect such a change were to be received from the Parliament of Canada it would be in accordance with precedent for the Government to introduce in Parliament, and for Parliament to enact appropriate legislation in compliance with the request.

The select committee did not note, however, that this statement directly contradicted its own new doctrine. The most curious thing is that Sir Anthony Kershaw, the chairman of the select committee, himself destroyed the credibility of his own report. In an interview given to Southam News in Edmonton, and reported in the Citizen on February 7, 1981, he predicted that the constitutional package would be adopted by the U.K. Parliament. He merely pleaded for time and said: "But don't expect us to push the thing through in two or three days". In my view, Sir Anthony has thus buried his own report.

I wish at this stage to summarize the points I have made up to now by stating two specific conclusions which are based on a proper interpretation of the evidence available. First, a binding convention has developed, during more than a century, according to which the U.K. Parliament amends the B.N.A. Act only at the request and with the consent of the Canadian Parliament, which is expressed through the adoption of a Joint Address by the Senate and the House of Commons. Second, there is no similar binding convention requiring provincial consent before or after the Canadian Parliament adopts such a joint address.

Where does this leave us now? Since 1927, the federal government has sought, without success, the unanimous agreement of the provinces on a Canadian amending formula. During all these years the provinces were under the false impression that they were better protected by the so-called unanimity rule, supposedly guaranteed by the status quo. But we rediscover today what others, including Premier McNair in 1950, had found before us, that in reality and for all practical purposes we have had a Canadian amending formula all along and that this formula did not require unanimous provincial consent, but a simple majority in both houses of Parliament, as former Prime Minister Bennett asserted in 1946. In my view, the Canadian Parliament should not have this de facto unlimited and overriding power in a true federal system. The very purpose of the proposed resolution is to eliminate it. The unanimity formula may be at most a recent political practice but, from a constitutional point of view, it is a myth, like the concept of provincial sovereignty in several important respects.

I would like now to raise another question. In the absence of any legal and constitutional requirement that could prevent Parliament from passing the proposed resolution, is it sound and proper for us to adopt it in terms of political expediency?

First, let us see whether the overall content of the resolution is desirable and whether it affects the federal-provincial equilibrium to the detriment of the provinces. The resolution, in its provision regarding the future amending formula, eliminates the de facto overriding power that the Canadian Parliament now has and gives new and specific constitutional rights in this respect to the provinces and to the Canadian people. Viewed in this perspective, the resolution affects federal-provincial relationships to the detriment of the Canadian Parliament. It involves the provinces directly, as a matter of constitutional right, in the amending process.

It is true that section 46 provides for a referendum at the sole initiative of the Canadian Parliament to change the Constitution, but this alternative will be used only as a deadlock-breaking mechanism. Moreover, a federal-provincial commission will be asked to define the rules of such a referendum to ensure its fairness. This provision for a referendum does not infringe upon any existing provincial constitutional right. It merely transfers an existing de facto federal power to the Canadian people in the four regions of the country, and it gives to the ten provincial governments the opportunity to oppose a federal deadlock-breaking proposal during a referendum campaign.

The provisions of the resolution regarding resources and equalization offer further constitutional guarantees to the provinces.

The Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which is the second major aspect of the resolution, does not affect federal-provincial relationships.

Senator Smith: Oh, yes it does.

Senator Lamontagne: Let me continue. The honourable senator will have his turn.

Indeed, section 30 states:

> Nothing in this Charter extends the legislative powers of any body or authority.

Senator Flynn: It restricts it.

Senator Lamontagne: The charter reduces provincial powers but it affects federal powers in the same way. The very purpose of entrenchment is to curb the authority of legislative bodies and to give to the citizens the additional protection of the courts. Viewed in this perspective, it is obvious that the proposed charter does not satisfy everybody, but I believe, like most people, that it is a realistic proposal, as a first step. It is to be hoped that it will be reviewed periodically, whenever desirable, once the entrenchment issue has been solved and a relatively flexible Canadian amending formula has been determined.

I find, therefore, that the overall content of the resolution is most desirable. It does not assign, as some argue, more powers to the Canadian Parliament. On the contrary, it gives more constitutional rights and guarantees to the provinces and to the Canadian people.

Many Canadians, while agreeing with the overall content of the resolution, claim that we should not go to London, even for the last time, more particularly, to get a Charter of Rights and freedoms. We all agree, I am sure, that it would be ideal if we could accomplish in Canada, through unanimous federal-provincial consent, the intent of the resolution. Unfortunately, I cannot see this ideal solution as a possibility, at least in the near future.

● (1630)

Canadians have deplored the colonial status of their Constitution for a long time. Henri Bourassa said in 1931:

> I feel somewhat ashamed to find that in the year 1931 the Dominion of Canada is the rearguard of all the dominions in the exercise of full-fledged autonomy.

He then expressed a hope, when he stated that:

> The time will certainly come when there will be enough wisdom, enough sense of self-respect either in the provinces or the Dominion of Canada, to find means of exercising that right of amending our own constitution by cooperation between the Dominion parliament and the provincial legislatures.

That was in 1935.

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Lamontagne: Following the failure of a federal-provincial conference to reach agreement on an amending formula in 1927, Professor Norman Rogers expressed the view, again in 1935, that a new conference would succeed, and I quote:

> In the first place, I would approach a new conference in the faith that something could be accomplished, particularly in view of the present state of public opinion in this country. I do believe that the people of this country are more alive to the importance of this problem today than ever before. I do not think because consideration of the matter by a previous conference failed that we are compelled to accept failure as the lot of another conference called in the near future.

Since 1927, as we all know, ten First Ministers' Conferences, often preceded by numerous meetings of ministers and officials, have failed to produce an agreement. The last attempt in September, 1980, followed many meetings of the Continuing Committee of Ministers on the Constitution during the summer months. Yet, today, some people still believe that, as Mr. Rogers has said, "another conference called in the near future" would succeed.

Unfortunately, there is no evidence to this effect. At their meeting in Toronto last October, the provinces did not even try to agree on a positive proposal that could have been presented to the Canadian Parliament. Six of them merely decided at that time to go to the courts. Premier Hatfield made it very clear to the Joint Committee on the Constitution that another conference would not succeed. A great deal has been made—and will be made again, I am sure, during the course of this debate—of the so-called provincial consensus reached at the Chateau Laurier last September. But Premier Blakeney stated before the joint committee on December 19, 1980, that this so-called consensus has been at best a "tactical agreement", saying, "I certainly do not like it, I do not think it is going to fly but it is our best bargaining position." I suggest, therefore, that the so-called Chateau consensus was not meaningful and substantive, and that even this tactical agreement does not exist today.

What about the meeting of six premiers held in Montreal on February 9, 1981 ? Its results were summarized, in part by the Citizen in an editorial published on February 10, as follows:

> But one premier, B.C.'s Bill Bennett, wanted the gang of six to seek a new amending formula, and he wanted to press for return to the bargaining by all the first ministers. Bennett's compromise attempt met with failure, largely because too many of the premiers don't want compromise. Lévesque wants failure. Lougheed and Peckford want energy jurisdiction. Lyon refuses to accept a charter of rights. But the split is there for all to see—

Under such circumstances, another conference would in my view be doomed to failure. Moreover, it should be noted that the proposed resolution does not impose an amending formula. If the provinces can reach a substantial agreement, during the next two years, on a formula of their own, they will be entitled, if the resolution is adopted, to submit this formula to the Canadian people for approval. This is, I believe, a fair and proper way of getting out of a long-standing deadlock.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lamontagne: Unfortunately, our past failures have not been limited to this impasse. Indeed, the record shows that it may be as impossible to get provincial agreement on an entrenched charter as it has been in the case of an amending formula. In 1946 Mr. John Diefenbaker deplored the fact that the Canadian Constitution did not contain a Charter of Rights. He said:

> The British North America Act contains no charter of liberty as does the constitution of the United States . . . It makes no declaration of the rights of man, as our cousins south of the line do when from time to time they speak with eloquence and power of a constitution that is couched in magnificent language.

In 1947, a Special Joint Committee on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms was established. It recommended that no attempt be made to enact a bill of rights only in the form of a federal statute; it was felt at the time that the provinces would not agree to be bound by an entrenched charter.

The adoption of a Bill of Rights by Parliament was delayed until 1960 mainly because it was thought that a mere legislative enactment, having no paramountcy over other legislation and limited to the federal sphere of jurisdiction, would not provide adequate protection to Canadian citizens. Curiously enough, the Quebec government was the first in Canada to propose the entrenchment of a charter. On July 25, 1960, Premier Lesage stated at a federal-provincial conference:

> We therefore believe that it is now necessary for us to have a Bill of Human Rights. We are also of the opinion that such a Bill would have a much greater actual and symbolic value if it were part of our constitution . . . It seems to us that we have here a magnificent opportunity to discuss this problem and to see if we cannot agree on a joint declaration of human rights that could be embedded in our Constitution.

This proposal unfortunately was not followed up at the time. At the Victoria constitutional conference in 1971, unanimity was reached in favour of an entrenched charter, but Quebec withdrew its support shortly thereafter. This issue was raised again at a federal-provincial conference in 1978 and although the previous unanimity was broken, a substantial majority of the provinces still favoured entrenchment. At the conference of September, 1980 only two provincial governments fully accepted putting in the Constitution the charter proposed by the federal government. These successive failures show that if the Canadian Parliament does not proceed unilaterally now to include a charter in the proposed resolution, the entrenchment of rights for the Canadian people will be postponed indefinitely.

Some people say that they would be ashamed to get their rights from a so-called foreign country. I suggest in this respect that Canada is a rather unique country, at least in one sense. We never had to fight or go through a revolution to acquire our independence and our basic rights. We got them all from that same so-called foreign country; but we got them by instalment.

Senator Donahoe: When we were colonies!

Senator Lamontagne: The provinces became the masters of their own constitutions, as Senator Macquarrie has told us, in 1867 through a British statute, as did the Canadian Parliament in 1949. Canada received its extraterritorial sovereignty in 1931 through another British statute. We also acquired our basic rights and freedoms, going back to the Magna Carta, from the United Kingdom. As far as I am concerned, I am proud to be a Canadian, but in view of all these antecedents it does not really offend my pride to have to go back again to Great Britain, but for the last time, in order to complete a process that began in 1774.

The issue raised by the resolution, in terms of political expediency, is therefore quite simple. Do we want to maintain the constitutional status quo and our colonial status indefinitely? If so, let us vote against the resolution. Do we want, on the other hand, to break long-standing deadlocks on patriation, an amending formula and the entrenchment of rights, thus opening the way, in a second phase, for other constitutional reforms? If so, let us use for the last time the only formula that the provinces thought appropriate in 1972, and vote for the resolution.

[Translation]

I wish to comment now very briefly, because I have spoken at length—perhaps as long as Senator Tremblay the other night—on an entirely different subject: the rights of anglophone and francophone minorities in Quebec and in the rest of Canada. If the charter contained in the resolution is adopted, for the first time in our history those minorities will have equal constitutional rights to education in their respective language throughout the country. In my opinion that is already great progress. But it is not really enough.

I particularly regret that Ontario, which is home to the largest francophone minority in Canada, did not resolutely commit itself, like New Brunswick, to institutional bilingualism by accepting, among other things, to be bound by section 133 of our Constitution. Were Ontario to decide to treat its linguistic minority the same way Quebec respects its own minority, a decisive step would be made to close the gap between our two main communities. The Government of Ontario has often expressed its commitment to Canadian unity. I am convinced that its credibility in that respect would be greatly enhanced if, at this historic moment, it were to agree at least to be bound by section 133.

As I see it, bilingualism, especially if it is based on two great international languages, is first and foremost a source of personal enrichment. But in a country like Canada it also has immense political value, for it is a guarantee of unity. Indeed I am deeply convinced that Quebec separatism will never gain currency if francophone communities in the rest of Canada, particularly in Ontario and New Brunswick, enjoy the rights and services they need not only to survive but to grow. I hope that in the course of this debate many senators, more especially anglophone senators, will express their views on that primordial problem.

I cannot end this long speech without mentioning the attitude of the Quebec government in this matter. That government does not believe there is a way out of the constitutional deadlock. It states in its white paper:

> In the opinion of the government of Quebec the sad story of attempts, as useless as they were numerous, to review the constitution demonstrates how illusory it will be henceforth to think about renewing federalism in such a way as to please Quebec and the rest of Canada at the same time.

But above all the PQ government does not want renewed federalism. That is why it is adamant on the unanimity formula, for that is how it protects the status quo in order to be in a better position to object to it. Under the circumstances, only a unilateral approach can break the deadlock. Those who oppose this initiative are therefore, unconsciously or not—and I know that Senator Flynn will disagree—playing into the hands of Quebec separatists. Indeed, the logical consequence of a vote against this resolution would be to maintain indefinitely the status quo. In my opinion, this is certainly not what most Canadians and the great majority of Quebecers want.

Senator Flynn: On the last point raised by Senator Lamontagne, may I ask a question? He said that all those who oppose the resolution are playing into the hands of the separatists.

Senator Lamontagne: Unconsciously.

Senator Flynn: I know. This is not what bothers me. Is Senator Lamontagne saying that the Quebec Liberal Party and the Union Nationale Party, which oppose the resolution, are also unconsciously playing into the hands of the separatists?

Senator Lamontagne: In this context, yes. However, there is a great difference between the position of the Union Nationale, which has taken so many different stands in the last few years, and that of the provincial Liberal Party, which I know quite well.

I submit that the provincial Liberal party is basically in agreement with this resolution. It objects to unilateral action, but it agrees that federalism should be improved. It agrees that the deadlock should be broken while, and this is a very significant difference, Mr. Lévesque and his supporters want the status quo.

Senator Flynn: Would Senator Lamontagne suggest to the government that it postpone putting forward the resolution to London until after the provincial election in Quebec? Thus, assuming that Mr. Ryan will become the next premier, we could then try to come to an agreement?

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, there is no doubt in my mind that Mr. Ryan will win the next provincial election, and on that point at least, we shall have no difficulty in getting along. However, if we delay the process once again, even if Mr. Ryan does not oppose the resolution, we would still have to face the opposition of Mr. Peckford, Mr. Lyon and Mr. Bennett if they are still in power in their own provinces.

Senator Flynn: No, I was talking of postponing the process until after the provincial election.

Senator Lamontagne: Do you mean until elections are held in the respective provinces of Mr. Bennett and the other provincial premiers?

Senator Roblin: The answer is no.

Senator Flynn: In that case, the answer is no.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—THIRD READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Godfrey for the third reading of Bill S-15, respecting The Royal Canadian Legion.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, yesterday afternoon, as most honourable senators will recall, this debate was adjourned in order to make sure that the sponsor of the bill could be present when I made the rest of my remarks, which will be brief, I hope. I had just read the proposed amendment to the statute affecting the Royal Canadian Legion, and also the existing provision which was to be deleted. Since both of those are rather short, perhaps I might do so again without taking up too much time.

● (1650)

The paragraph in the present statute, which was passed in 1948, deals with the membership of the Legion—that is, the classes or kinds of persons who shall be admitted to membership. It reads now as follows:

> (i) those persons who have served or are serving in Her Majesty's navy, army or air force or any auxiliary force thereof,
>
> (ii) those persons who have served or are serving in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and
> (iii) the sons and daughters of any of those persons referred to in subparagraphs (i) and (ii),

The proposal in the bill is that those words be deleted and that the following words be substituted for them. They are not broken down into subclauses (i), (ii) and (iii), but are embodied in clause (a):

> (a) to constitute an association of those persons who have served or are serving in Her Majesty's armed forces or any auxiliary force thereof, and of other persons—

These are the words to which I intend to direct my remarks.

> —and of other persons who support the purposes and objects of the Legion,

So instead of enumerating the kind of people who shall be admitted to membership, the amendment would allow membership to be granted to any other persons who support the purposes and objects of the Legion—which is, of course, a very wide definition indeed and, depending upon what the authorities in the Legion—the Dominion Command or any convention assembled—at some future date might decide, it could really make it a completely different organization from what it is now.

Under the present provision, I would ask honourable senators to note how the common thread of service to the country, in an organized, disciplined force, authorized to bear arms, binds the groups named as being entitled to membership, except the sons and daughters who may be thought to have learned something of that common thread.

We see how that thread would be completely abandoned if the amendment became law; the Legion would no longer remain as an association of those who have experienced the discipline, the sense of values, the feeling of mutual respect which arises from that common bond. It would be just like any other fraternal organization, such as the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Elks, or any of the like. It is bound to lose the esprit de corps that brought it into being in the first place, and which has been one of the main reasons for the splendid work which the Legion has done and is doing for veterans who need help and for the widows, orphans and other dependents of deceased veterans.

After second reading, the bill was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science and representatives of the Legion appeared before the committee on January 21, 1981. I have before me the printed proceedings of the committee for that date—the Proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science for Wednesday, January 21, 1981, Issue No. 2.

Turning to page 2:6 we find that the following representatives of the Legion appeared before the committee: the President of Dominion Command, Mr. A. Harvey; the Secretary of Dominion Command, Mr. J. E. A. J. Lamy; and Mr. Stanley Walpole, the Administrative Officer of the Legion—at Dominion Headquarters, I assume although it does not say so.

Mr. Harvey took very little part in the proceedings. He simply drew attention to the fact that the other people were present and that the Legion had changed somewhat, to the extent at least that sons and daughters of members were admitted into membership and were given the right to hold office and have full voting power. He then asked Mr. Lamy, the Secretary, to deal with the matter before the committee.

At page 2:7 Mr. Lamy read the existing provisions about membership, and went on to say:

> Over the years—not just lately, but over the years—our conventions have made other categories of people eligible to join the Legion—people who they thought deserved to join. They did not really know about the act of incorporation, and they have taken people who were not covered under the act.

Which seems to me to be somewhat extraordinary. Incidentally, I am informed—in view of the mention by, I believe, Senator Godfrey—that the Legion should not have had to come to Parliament anyway because they could have been incorporated by letters patent, or words to that effect. Although I have not checked it myself, that originally was the course followed by the Legion. In the beginning they were incorporated by letters patent, and in 1948 they decided that an act of Parliament would be more desirable. Such an act was obtained in 1948.

So evidently they were well aware of the right to be incorporated without reference to Parliament, and they chose Parliament as the venue in which they wished to have their rights dealt with. As I believe I said yesterday, once having chosen to come to Parliament, they must then accept the fact that Parliament will not necessarily do everything that it is asked, but will exercise its own best judgment and act accordingly.

Mr. Lamy went on to say:

> I shall mention some of those people who have been taken in over the years, and honourable senators will possibly judge that they are deserving of being members of the Legion. The following are in the first category: Those people who are now Canadian citizens or Commonwealth subjects who had active service in a force of Her Majesty's allies in a conflict in which Canada took part—in other words, the First and Second World Wars and the Korean War. Someone who served, let us say, in the American Army in the Second World War and is now a Canadian citizen was admitted to the Legion. Also those who have served in an actual theatre of war, during a war in which Canada was engaged, in some non-military service, such as the Mercantile Marine, the Merchant Navy, the Newfoundland Rescue Tug, the Deep Sea Salvage Tugs, the Fishery Patrol Service, the Corps of Canadian Firefighters, the War Correspondents; auxiliary services which comprised the Legion, YMCA, Salvation Army, and Knights of Columbus; the Canadian Red Cross, the St. John Ambulance, the Ferry Command, and those members of the Newfoundland Forestry, (Overseas Units), who had at least six months service overseas; the British Home Guard, the National Fire Services of Great Britain, and the Air Raid Wardens.
> Over the years we have also admitted people who have participated in the United Nations or Commonwealth police action in Korea, the Congo, the Gaza Strip, Cyprus, or any other area that may be specified by Dominion Command. One such area is Lebanon, which is not named here but might be later. There are also those who fought in the Underground in allied countries such as France, Italy, Holland or Belgium.
> Those people were taken into the Legion by convention over the years. What we are trying to do today is to regularize their position. We do not wish to name each one of them because it would exclude some categories which we may not have covered here. I have already named one not included here—namely, those who served in Lebanon. There may be other types of people who are not yet included but who may be brought in by our delegates at some future convention.

Honourable senators will see that all of those groups that were mentioned by Mr. Lamy were people who had that common characteristic, or common feature, of service to their country in an organized, disciplined unit, although some of them, such as the auxiliary services, were obviously not authorized to bear arms.

● (1700)

It seems to me that the Legion could very well achieve its purpose of regularizing what it thinks it has done irregularly by definition far less wide than the one it has used, which really means anybody who says he supports the purposes and offices of the Legion may join.

I certainly would not consider opening the doors to the groups named by Mr. Lamy as in any way objectionable. As I said, again to accomplish this relatively limited purpose, surely more satisfactory and less expansive words could be used than those which are placed before us.

Legion representatives say that the present membership of veterans is aging, and that the grim reaper is harvesting more and more of them as each year goes by. In due course, all of them will be gone. Unfortunately, that is all too true. I agree some steps should be taken now to deal with that situation before it actually happens.

Perhaps we could look at the situation that is now developing with membership. This was dealt with by Mr. Lamy in his testimony before the committee. What he said on this point will be found in part on page 2:12 of the committee's report:

> Honourable senators, for ordinary and life members the top number we had was in 1977, when we had 318,789 members. This was the peak. Since then it has gone down.

He goes on to say:

> At the end of 1980 we had 310,854. There is a loss of 8,000 in three years.

Senator Macdonald then asked him, "What about the sons and daughters. Does that offset the loss?" Mr. Lamy said that in 1977 they had 82,302 sons and daughters, and went on to say that by 1980 this number had risen to 116,009. I am not sure exactly whether Mr. Lamy meant that these 116,000 sons and daughters were to be added to the 317,000 or not. For the purpose of the present discussion, I will take it that there are 317,000 members over and above the 116,000 sons and daughters.

Even taking that figure, one comes to the conclusion that there is more than one-third of the total membership of the Legion who are not bound together by that common thread of service which I mentioned, and who are, obviously, and I think quite properly, diligent members because of their close relationship to veterans of all services. One does not have to look very far to see the way these figures are pointing. Our own knowledge of the uncertainty and relative shortness of life in this world tells us that it will not be long before there are no veterans left. At that time the total membership will be non-veteran.

If we change the law the way we are asked to in this amendment, as I pointed out a few moments ago, the total membership of the Legion will then be of people who have no connection, or may have no connection, with the kind of people, service and experience that was originally intended to be necessary in order to be a member of this organization, which I regard as one of the very best organizations of which I have ever heard or in which I have ever served, and certainly I have every sympathy with it.

I realize that some extension of the membership ought to be made to deal with this situation when there are no veterans left. The question is: To whom should membership be opened? You can see by the names of the organizations that Mr. Lamy mentioned that there is a very wide spectrum of organizations that are qualified. One could easily add to them, I think, such organized and disciplined forces serving their country in one way or another as provincial and municipal police and fire-fighting organizations. There would thus be a reservoir of potential members who, of course, would include members of the ongoing armed forces, the RCMP, and the provincial and municipal police forces in the country, all organized in such a way that they are disciplined and enjoy a common bond of having served the country in an organization which is ready and willing to face whatever dangers may come.

All of these organizations that I have mentioned do face dangers. One has only to notice the day-to-day reports in the press of the number of firemen who are killed or seriously injured fighting fires, and the number of policemen who are killed while carrying out their duties, to realize that they are risking their lives. They are serving the country and serving it well. This gives them some linkage with the feelings, attitudes and experiences of the veterans who organized the Legion in the first place, and that future membership potential is more likely to be in tune with the present aims and purposes of the Legion, as well as with the aims and purposes which brought about the incorporation in the first place.

It should not be a difficult task to open the doors wide enough to accommodate the kind of people I have mentioned whom, without throwing them open to practically anybody, the amendment envisages.

Honourable senators, although I do not like this change, I am not going to urge you to deny the bill a third reading, but it has to go to the other place before it becomes law. Perhaps in committee there the Legion will suggest some such change in wording as I have mentioned, or at least have another opportunity to consider whether they really want to open the doors as wide as this proposed amendment would open them, or whether some more carefully and narrowly worded amendment would better serve their purposes and intention and those of the Legion.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that if the Honourable Senator Godfrey speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, Senator Smith has already given some figures as to the composition of the Legion at the present time. Senator Macdonald, when he made his speech, said:

> I would expect that the number of actual Canadian veterans in the Legion is now less than the number of other members, and perhaps the sponsor would obtain the actual figures with regard to that for the record.

In the committee hearings the figures were given, as mentioned by Senator Smith, except for this new category of membership. Mr. Lamy said:

> The other groups in the Legion are, if I may say so, Mr. Chairman, relatively small. They are not large groups.

I have spoken to Mr. Lamy, and he says his best estimate is that the people we are talking about, and who have been let in by the Legion under the illusion it had the power to let them in, now number between 2,000 and 3,000.

• (1710)

My main disagreement with Senator Smith and Senator Macdonald is simply that the duty of the Senate in matters of this kind is to see whether what has been proposed is against the public interest. It is not for us to decide that if we were members of the Legion we may not agree with certain proposals that the Legion members might make. If the Legion were incorporated by letters patent, no bureaucrat would refuse an amendment or supplementary letters patent on the basis of these proposals, because there is nothing contained in them which is against the public interest. There is nothing that we can find objectionable, even though, if we were members of the Legion, as Senator Smith and Senator Macdonald are, we might very well object to them.

I really think the place where the Legion must be protected is the Legion convention, where arguments such as those given tonight by Senator Smith, and previously by Senator Macdonald, should be made. The Legion has considered this. They have had their legal advisers and the chairman of their constitution committee, who is a very eminent appeal court judge, consider this. Theyhave come to the conclusion that this is what they want to do. I feel that the Legion is a mature organization; it can be trusted. Therefore, this bill should be approved as it stands.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt this motion?

Senator Macdonald: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Julien Chouinard, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bill:

An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, March 2, 1981 at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, March 2, 1981

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Honourable Renaude Lapointe, P.C., Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the honour to table:

Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982.

And, to bring further delight to the ranks of the official opposition:

Document entitled "The Government Expenditure Plan, Part I, 1981-82 Estimates", issued by Treasury Board.

INCOME TAX

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject matter of Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax. I would ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

THE ESTIMATES

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31 March, 1982.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, March 3, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I suppose we need no explanation.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ESTIMATES

INCREASE IN GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, now that the Leader of the Government has tabled the estimates, I suppose he is ready, indeed anxious and willing, to reply to the questions put to him last week which he refused to answer because, technically, the estimates were not before us or the other place.

I would ask the question put to him by Senator Roblin: Is it the view of the government that, in providing for this increase of 13 per cent in the spending estimates, the government is discharging the commitment of the Prime Minister made last January during the election campaign, when he was Leader of the Opposition, to increase spending by no more than the growth in the economy?

● (2005)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Minister of State for Economic Development may wish to comment on this particular matter, but that remains the general objective of the government. The Leader of the Opposition, of course—

Hon. Lowell Murray: It is a commitment.

Senator Perrault: —knows that these are not the easiest of economic times, which was also the situation experienced by the predecessor government. There are no magic cures or instant solutions. However, the budget policy generally remains consistent with the statements made by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister.

Hon. Martial Asselin: But you will use all means to win an election.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): And you will use all means to lose one.

Senator Flynn: As the Leader of the Government has suggested, perhaps these matters, which are so technical, can be referred to the Minister of State for Economic Development, since he always replies in a technical manner and to the point.

Can he confirm that every Canadian taxpayer will be paying, through his or her tax dollars, in excess of $750 per capita just to service the national debt?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, we can go into the finer details. These are not so much technical matters because they are contained in the estimates, and a calculation would have to be made to ascertain how much the per capita amount would be.

I draw the attention of my friend, the Leader of the Opposition, to the fact that we have just passed a motion to send those estimates to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. I am sure that with their usual diligence and probing, he and his colleagues will seek and find precise answers to the kind of question that he has just raised. I do not disagree with him, but I believe I saw a calculation somewhere to the effect that it works out to something like the $750 that he is talking about. I want to make it very clear that that is not a calculation done by my department or the government. I would be very happy to give him an undertaking to obtain the exact amount, if he would like the division done.

ENERGY

OIL—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have a question to direct to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Does the minister agree with the recently expressed views of the chairman of the Canadian Petroleum Association that investment in oil and gas exploration and development in western Canada is being reduced in 1981 by 20 per cent as compared to 1980?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, here again Senator Smith will realize that that is an opinion expressed by the chairman of the Canadian Petroleum Association. I suppose that it is his business to do that kind of calculation. It would be interesting to know whether or not it is a reduction from intentions or a reduction from actual of some years in the past.

Senator Smith: I suppose it is also the business of somebody in the government, and I would have thought it was of the minister himself, to observe these things very closely and to be able to have some idea where we are heading for in matters related to gas and oil exploration and development. If he is not the minister responsible, then I would be grateful if he would see what the minister who is responsible says. What I am really asking is: Is this a fair estimate from the information available to the government as of today?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not believe that any accurate or true assessment can be made at this point in time. If my honourable friend wants to dig deep enough he will find that the chairman of the Canadian Petroleum Association also said that the fact that there is no agreement between the governments of the producing provinces and the government of Canada on a number of things is indeed hurting the exploration that might otherwise take place. We agree with that. We have stated in this chamber and in the other place, over and over again, that it is absolutely essential that we have an agreement so that the industry can move forward with confidence and do extensive exploration and development to bring this country to self-sufficiency by the end of this decade. We did not make that assertion lightly. We honestly and sincerely believe that it could be done, if there were an agreement and the industry did indeed do those things that I have talked about with regard to both exploration and development.

[Senator Asselin.]

• (2010)

Senator Smith: Since the minister has raised the question himself, and since I have it before me for further exploration, I would invite him to say whether or not the government agrees with the proposition, put forward by the same gentleman whom we have been discussing, that:

> Failure to resolve this conflict will likely cause Canada "to drift to dependence on imports for about 38 per cent of our (oil) needs by 1985 and to 45 per cent by 1990" from the present level of 20 per cent.

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, it seems to me that it is taking the argument to its extreme if we are to assume, as is implied in what has just been quoted, that there will be no agreement by 1985 or, indeed, by 1990. I believe we have the right to express the hope, at least, that there will be an agreement reached for most of the rest of this decade within the next few weeks and certainly within the next few months.

Senator Smith: As a supplementary, does the minister feel like telling us whether or not he agrees that not only is the reaching of an agreement between the producing provinces and the federal government a necessity, but it is really up to the federal government to make a fresh move now?

Senator Olson: No, I do not agree with that. In fact, exactly the opposite is true, because the federal government and the ministers directly responsible have requested within the last few days—I am not sure of the exact date when the last letter was sent, but I believe it was a week ago today—that the Government of Alberta reconsider any cut-backs in production and get back to negotiations, to which the reply from the spokesman of the Government of Alberta was that they were not ready to re-open negotiations. So the way that my honourable friend has described the position is an exact 180-degree conversion of the truth.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Smith: I suppose that depends on where one stands and one's point of view; but even assuming, as I do without any denial, the truth of the facts which the minister has just asserted, I am still inclined to differ with him about his conclusions from them.

Senator Olson: That is not the first time that has happened, and I suppose it will not be the last when there are different points of view. I would just hope that the honourable gentleman would have as much respect for my views as I have for his.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—ROYAL BANK OF CANADA REPORT

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. I am sure he is pleased to note that the Royal Bank of Canada global energy group has released its study of the National Energy Program, which was prepared by a number of people, not least among whom was a former chairman of the National Energy Board. That report states quite definitely that the program will lead to sharp reductions in exploration and development.

One of the more worrisome points in the report, which is brought out quite forcibly, is the allegation that even those companies that will be eligible for incentives under the Canadianization plan of the government will see a lower return in revenue, from 1982 to 1990, of well over 40 per cent and closer to 50 per cent. Perhaps the minister will tell us whether or not that is true, because it is a rather terrifying statement.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not like asking this, but it happens quite often and it will happen again now. Lower than what?

Senator Doody: Lower than last year.

Senator Olson: Lower than last year? That could be the opinion of the person, or persons, responsible for writing the report; but if my honourable friend wants to be objective he can look at the National Energy Program, and even though it is subject to further negotiations on a number of pricing structures which we have already announced we would be willing to negotiate, it does call for a doubling of oil prices by 1986, and a quadrupling of oil prices by the end of this decade. To put all of that together and make the assumption that there is going to be a 40 per cent reduction in revenue, or profit, or whatever term he was using, seems to indicate some kind of distorted reasoning that does not lead to the right kind of conclusions.

● (2015)

Senator Doody: The reasoning might be distorted, and that is why I quoted the Royal Bank of Canada's global energy group. I hesitate to make a criticism of my own. I have been critical of the program earlier, and some people could accuse me, unjustly perhaps, of partisanship. I do not think that the Royal Bank of Canada, however, is suspect in that area, so when they say that the problem is a very worrying one, I think that it is worth bringing to the attention of the minister, and that the request for clarification is quite legitimate. Nevertheless, perhaps that kind of information is not available, under the Official Secrets Act, something like the Irish moss problem that my friend next door has.

TRANSPORT

AIRLINES—SALE OF NORDAIR

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

In responding last week to a question in the other place, the Minister of Transport implied that while his first choice is to sell Nordair to Regionair, he stresses that Regionair must still satisfy a number of conditions, most of which would require its merger with the Lizotte group. Meanwhile, André Lizotte, the President of Nordair, has said that a merger between his consortium and Regionair is unlikely.

Would the Leader of the Government indicate when we can expect the government to cease trying to solve its political difficulties by encouraging a merger between these two groups, and when we can expect the announcement of a decision to be made?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. I know it is of considerable importance, particularly in the honourable senator's province and other Atlantic areas.

While I am on my feet, honourable senators—

Senator Asselin: I have not finished.

[Translation]

I would say this is about the third time—you may check in Hansard, our official report—that I have been given the same answer.

Some two years ago, the Canadian government agreed to sell the Nordair group to private interests.

For the past two years, there has been a lot of lobbying of the Minister of Transport and the Cabinet. It went on while our party was in office.

Heaven knows that regional transport companies need this additional income to make them profitable.

All during that time, studies are carried out by Quebecair, Nordair and the Inuit. Never has the minister had the courage to come to a decision. Could the government give us the assurance that it will make a decision shortly, to put an end to confusion in an area as important as air transportation, especially in regions such as Quebec City and northern Quebec?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall endeavour to bring a statement to the chamber some time this week on the general subject.

VISITORS IN THE GALLERY

NATIONAL FARMERS UNION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this evening I take great pleasure in welcoming to the Senate galleries 250 representatives of one of Canada's most effective and well-known organizations, the National Farmers Union, who have come to Ottawa at their own expense. For the next three days they will be meeting representatives of all political parties to discuss with them matters relating to the Crowsnest Pass rate, and undoubtedly other matters as well.

The Honourable Senator Argue informs me that they come from most of the provinces, including Prince Edward Island and the Peace River country of my own province of British Columbia. I know that all honourable senators, regardless of party, welcome them in our midst here in Ottawa.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

EAST COAST FISHERIES AND MARITIME BOUNDARY TREATIES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. However, before I pose the question I would like to express, as my predecessors did not, a warm welcome to our illustrious former Speaker on her return to the exalted Chair. Her voice is more pleasant than that of the present Speaker!

My question has to do with a statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on Friday last, prior to the annual meeting of the Progressive Conservative Party, to the effect that the still unratified fisheries treaties constitute the most important outstanding issue between Canada and the United States. In light of the significance of that statement, could the Leader of the Government offer the assurance that the question of the fisheries treaties will be first on the agenda, or will at least be given the high priority it deserves, at the Prime Minister's meeting with President Reagan next week?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on an earlier occasion I gave an answer in the Senate in which I stated that the fisheries item is expected to be given great prominence on the agenda for discussions between the President of the United States and the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and their officials. If I can provide that reassurance again, I am pleased to do so at this time.

Senator Marshall: I am pleased with that answer, but I am wondering if the Leader of the Government in the Senate, in his exalted position in the cabinet, could indicate to the Senate prior to the meetings the proposals which will be suggested by the Canadian government to President Reagan, in light of this outstanding issue which is so important to the eastern regions of Canada. Could he, prior to the meetings, give us an indication of the proposals that Canada expects to put to President Reagan?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it seems to me that detailing the proposals which we would hope to place before the President might be destructive of the bargaining process. Implicit in the bargaining process is the opportunity for both sides to sit down, discuss and negotiate. I do not think it would help any ultimate negotiation to have details of that kind made public in advance.

[Senator Perrault.]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—STATEMENT BY SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, my question also deals with Canada-United States relations, but it is by no means confined to bilateral relations; in fact, it is a matter of concern to the whole world because it concerns the peace of the world. I am prompted to ask it by a very disturbing story in last Friday's Globe and Mail to the effect that the Canadian government through our distinguished and learned Secretary of State for External Affairs, has indicated a reversal of Canada's attitude in reference to the United States' involvement on behalf of the junta in El Salvador. We are now told that he has said, after a conversation with General Haig, which must have been a doozer, "I would certainly not condemn any decision that undertakes to send offensive arms to El Salvador. The United States can at least count on our quiet acquiescence."

Considering the anxiety and anguish which prominent and well-informed church groups in Canada are expressing; noting the harassment and, indeed, the killing of some distinguished representatives of the church by the Government of El Salvador; and surely with some memory of what went on in Vietnam and how it started, can the Honourable Leader of the Government indicate to me that our distinguished Secretary of State for External Affairs and the government have not in fact been cajoled, brainwashed, or put in the position of acquiescence or quiescence—whichever word they like—by the Secretary of State of the United States?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on the matter of the provision of arms to El Salvador, Canada has a long-standing policy of not providing military aid to areas of tension, and thus does not supply either offensive or defensive equipment to El Salvador.

As honourable senators are aware, we are opposed to interference by any nation in the internal affairs of El Salvador or any other nation. We believe that sending in military aid and other forms of destructive intervention is not in the interests of either El Salvador or the peace of the world. Canada deplores the fact that competing forces in El Salvador are receiving supplies from outside sources. The Secretary of State for External Affairs discussed the United States military assistance to El Salvador with Secretary of State Haig on January 30 and made it clear that Canada is opposed to the supply of offensive arms. The United States has informed us that in its view re-supply of the armed forces of El Salvador was required to counter a leftist offensive made possible by the supply of arms from other outside countries.

In the circumstances, we do not believe that Canada's role is to mount a public protest against the United States, but rather to continue to express its view in appropriate ways as before.

On foreign intervention, let me repeat, honourable senators, Canada strongly supports the traditional principle of international law, which is one of opposition to any interference from the outside in another country's domestic affairs.

● (2025)

Honourable senators, Canada is deeply troubled by the deteriorating human rights situation in El Salvador. Officials of the Department of External Affairs have expressed to Salvadorian officials on many occasions Canada's views on the junta's response to violence from both the left and the right. On February 16 Canada's concern for the human rights of the recently arrested directors of the University of El Salvador was expressed to the ambassador of El Salvador.

At the Tenth General Assembly of the Organization of American States, Canada's ambassador lobbied actively in corridor discussions expressing Canada's concerns. Canada voted on December 15, 1980, in favour of the UNGA resolution urging the Government of El Salvador to take the necessary steps to restore full respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Canada will continue to monitor developments in El Salvador and make further representations to Salvadorian authorities as appropriate. In addition, Canada will remain active in discussions in international forums such as the United Nations Human Rights Commission on the issues involved. It must be borne in mind, however, that Canada does not have a resident ambassador in San Salvador and has a limited capacity to influence developments in El Salvador.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I know we have no resident ambassador in San Salvador, but we must have points of view. I should like to know if the Government of Canada acquiesces in what the United States is doing. It is just less than two hours ago that we heard the report that the number of observers and technical experts has been increased this very day. Anyone with a memory knows that that is exactly the way it began in Vietnam. We can all remember how difficult it was for the then Liberal government, under a most distinguished internationalist, Mr. Pearson, finally to reach the stage where, according to its conscience, Canada felt that the bombing of Vietnam had to be criticized. And he told some of us what kind of experience he had after he met with President Johnson.

I would ask the government to give consideration to acting like a real friend of the United States, because no country suffered more over Vietnam than did the United States. Surely, for us to acquiesce in a build-up, a quickly increasing build-up, of that vicious junta would be to follow a course of action that would be against progressive development in the Caribbean.

I thought our minister did well some weeks ago, when he went to that destabilizing area with some interesting programs, but I am deeply concerned at the present developments.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I repeat for the benefit of the honourable senator, who obviously did not hear what I said, that with respect to foreign intervention Canada strongly supports the traditional principle of international law, which is one of opposition to any outside interference in another country's domestic affairs. So we are opposed to interference by any country in the affairs of El Salvador.

● (2030)

Further to this point, on January 26, El Salvador's "leftist" diplomatic commission visited Canada to meet with officials, and that meeting was attended briefly by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The representatives of this group explained their views on the situation in El Salvador and stressed the importance of non-intervention of external powers in the internal affairs of El Salvador, but did not ask for any form of official recognition.

At that meeting Canada's stance against foreign intervention in the internal affairs of El Salvador was outlined and an explanation of Canada's opposition to the provision of arms from any country to the competing forces in El Salvador was outlined. The meeting did not constitute the recognition of El Salvador's "leftist" organizations or support of their aims.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I can take it then that Canada does not acquiesce in the provision of arms by the United States to the junta and, in fact, includes in its blanket condemnation the actions of the United States. If that is the case, I accept that action.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator may conclude what he wishes from the remarks, which represent the official opposition of the government.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, it is my right and my responsibility to the members of this chamber to try to elucidate from the Leader of the Government what, in fact, the government is doing. I want to know if the government is condemning the United States in this matter.

Senator Olson: Read the answer; it is all there.

Senator Perrault: When the honourable senator has had an opportunity tomorrow to calmly read my remarks as they appear in the record of today's proceedings, I believe he will conclude that he was given a fair answer this evening. Does the honourable senator want the government to issue a condemnation of the United States or of any other country? I have spelled out the Canadian policy, and it is one of non-intervention.

Senator Macquarrie: Because I am on the wrong side of the house, it is not my job to be giving my views. If there were a forum, I would be very glad to give those views. It is my job to find out clearly, precisely, definitely and honourably just what the government is doing. God willing, I will pursue the matter tomorrow, after I have read the honourable senator's answers.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. Can the Leader of the Government assure this House that Canada will not, either directly or indirectly, supply arms to friendly countries which will then deliver them to the El Salvador military junta to use against the population?

We had been given the same assurance in the past concerning Vietnam and God knows that Canada did indirectly supply arms to Vietnam. Can the minister assure us that the government of Canada will watch and monitor the situation closely so that the arms we sell to friendly countries are not used against the people of El Salvador?

[English]

Senator Perrault: There seems to be a determination by certain honourable senators in the opposition to somehow establish Canadian complicity in a type of civil war involving a neighbouring country of this hemisphere.

Honourable senators, I can say something about Canadian participation. A request was received from the Government of El Salvador in November 1980, for assistance in the form of food aid. This request could not be met for technical reasons. It came at a time when requests for food aid during fiscal year 1981-82 were already in and being evaluated by CIDA. However, Canada is making a contribution of $250,000 to the International Committee of the Red Cross in favour of El Salvador. This is the kind of aid which this nation traditionally extends to those in distress in various parts of the world.

Honourable senators, I will seek to make a further statement on this situation later this week. However, it is difficult to understand the persistence of the official opposition in attempting to establish some sort of illicit or immoral Canadian role in some form of military action in El Salvador.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I believe I have the right to rise on a question of privilege. One's careful, assiduous role in trying to elicit information should not be categorized as it has been by the Leader of the Government. It is not for us to be accused in our search for truth or to have our views castigated as has been attempted by the honourable senator. I do not believe that either Senator Asselin or myself have smuggled into this Question Period a propogation of our views. When the time comes, I am sure that we will be glad to give those views. We are trying to find out what the honourable senator's colleagues are saying, and we are basing our queries on highly contradictory statements which are now public property.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have nothing further to add at this point.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

ROYAL COMMISSION ON NEWSPAPERS

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): On February 24, the Honourable Robert Muir asked the following question with regard to the Kent Commission:

> —how much money has been spent by the Kent Commission up to 8.45 this evening? Could he also advise how many sittings that commission has had and where they were held?

The answer is as follows:

> (1) As of February 26, 1981, $502,203.00 has been spent by the Commission out of its total budget of $1,487,000.00: $970,000 in the 1980-81 Estimates, and $517,000.00 in the 1981-82 Estimates.
>
> The Commission is to report not later than July 1, 1981.
> (2) The Commission has held 17 hearings in 11 cities as of Februray 27, 1981, as follows:
> Winnipeg, December 8 and 9, 1980
> Ottawa, December 11 and 12, 1980
> Victoria, January 16, 1981
> Vancouver, January 19 and 20, 1981
> London, February 3, 1981
> Toronto, February 6 and 9, 1981
> Thunder Bay, February 12, 1981
> Montreal, February 16, 17 and 18, 1981
> Edmonton, February 23, 1981
> Saint John, February 25, 1981
> Halifax, February 27, 1981

CANADA PENSION PLAN

NON-FUNDED LIABILITY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I have two delayed answers. The first is to a question asked by Senator Phillips on January 14—and I see that he has slipped out of the house for a moment—concerning the Canada Pension Plan.

(The answer follows:)

> It is alarmist and irresponsible to suggest that one day the Canada Pension Plan won't be able to pay for the pensions that have been promised. The financing of the Plan is absolutely sound. The current contribution rate is completely sufficient to raise the money needed to pay for the current benefits, and this will continue to be the case for several more years. Of course, the contribution rate will have to be increased at some time in the future. This has been anticipated since the C.P.P. was established in 1966. However the issues involved in such an increase are complex and careful study is necessary. Moreover the concurrence of the provinces is required for any increase. A federal-provincial committee of deputy ministers of finance has struck a subcommittee to develop recommendations.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

RECOMBINANT DNA RESEARCH—REGULATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the reply to a question asked in the Senate by Honourable Senator Thompson on January 29 with regard to recombinant DNA research is very long.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): On what?

Senator Perrault: Recombinant DNA research. It has something to do with genetics and genetic engineering. If honourable senators would like me to go through this long report, I would be glad to do so. Otherwise, may it be incorporated in the record of today's proceedings?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of reply see Appendix B, p. 1911.)

NEWFOUNDLAND

SEAL HUNT PROTEST ACTIVITIES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, while we are on delayed answers, last Tuesday I asked the Leader of the Government a question relating to three supposed conservationists who intend to spray the seals during the seal hunt this year. Has the honourable senator received an answer from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans as to what action will be taken to apprehend these reported conservationists in order to keep them away from the seal hunt, and in order to allow the seal fishermen of Newfoundland to conduct the seal fishery as it has traditionally been conducted for many years.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I regret to say that the response has not yet been received. Hopefully, it will be here tomorrow.

THE CONSTITUTION

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 26, the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I wish to join with all the previous speakers in paying tribute to the members of the special joint committee on their examination of the proposed resolution we are now debating. There are 57 issues on the minutes of that committee, so it is obvious that a great deal of time and effort must have been expended by the committee members.

Those minutes constitute some important reference work and are of great interest. I confess that I have not read all of them carefully, but I did carefully read a number which I considered to be of more than ordinary importance.

Honourable senators, while studying the proposed resolution, my first reaction was pretty much the same as that expressed so well by Senator Fournier. Like him, I feel that there are more important and more pressing problems in Canada demanding attention than the patriation of the Constitution. I certainly do not agree with those who feel that this is such an important piece of legislation that it demands priority. In my mind, while it is desirable to have the Constitution here with the addition of an amending formula, I believe there are other and more pressing matters which require urgent attention.

I see a tremendous necessity for action by the government to deal with inflation and the curse of unemployment. Apparently, the government sees no urgency in these matters. Indeed, it appears that the government has no real appreciation of the need to deal with the twin evils of inflation and unemployment or, if it does recognize the problems, it has no solutions to offer. All one hears about is the Constitution.

Like Senator Fournier, I think the further one gets from Ottawa, the less interest one finds in the debate on the Constitution. This is understandable since the ordinary Canadian has more immediate problems which require his or her attention. They are concerned about the ever-rising cost of living. There is no interest shown in the patriation of the Constitution by a person trying to live on the old age pension and its supplement. There is no interest shown in the patriation of the Constitution by persons trying to get along on welfare, or by those earning just enough to be over the poverty line. These are people who are finding it more and more difficult just to live, to get enough to eat, to heat their homes and to clothe themselves.

Can one expect much interest in the Constitution from a person who, on January 23 of this year, had to pay 99.5 cents for a gallon of domestic heating oil when, on January 3, 1980, he had to pay only 70.9 cents for that gallon of oil. One cannot expect a person who uses coal as domestic fuel to have much interest in the Constitution when he now pays $75 a ton for coal and remembers that in 1980 he paid $65—and that is the cost at the coal yard.

One cannot expect too much interest to be shown in the Constitution by the unemployed—especially by the unemployed whose unemployment insurance has run out or is about to run out. I notice that new claims for unemployment insurance in Canada rose by 7.4 per cent to a total of 303,000 in December, from 282,000 in November.

Practically every day we read of renegotiated residential mortgage interest rates rising to astronomical heights. I do not believe it is much consolation to all those people to know that the Constitution is to be brought to Canada and stored in some vault in Ottawa where there will be no danger of its being lost or mislaid.

Honourable senators, I believe it is time—indeed, it is more than time—for the government to put its priorities in order and to put first things first. I further believe the first priority—the first problem which demands attention by the government—is the deplorable state of our economy.

As regards the resolution before us, I again state my belief that all the United Kingdom Parliament should be asked to do is to pass the necessary legislation to make the B.N.A. Act a statute of Canada, with only one amendment, that being an amending formula. I firmly believe that any other amendments should be made in Canada. I firmly believe that a Canadian Charter of Rights, if desirable, should be made in Canada for Canadians by Canadians, and not by Englishmen in London. Personally, I find it humiliating that the Government of Canada should have to go to the U.K. Parliament to obtain a Charter of Rights and Freedoms for Canadians.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macdonald: It just does not make good sense to me. I thought we had long since ceased to have colonial status and had become an independent nation. I was strengthened in that belief by the fact that we have direct communication with the monarch, that we negotiate treaties with foreign powers, and, yes, that we even declared war as an independent nation. You may remember that, to emphasize our independence, Canada declared war on Germany one week after Great Britain had done so.

Now we have a government that wants to turn back the clock; that wants to reverse the course of our history and tradition, and to act as if there had been no constitutional development since 1867. To me, such policy makes no sense and, certainly, it contains no logic.

On the one hand, we have the determination to have the U.K. Parliament pass a Charter of Rights for Canadians, threatening that Parliament with some kind of serious consequences if it does not do so. In other words our government is asking the Parliament of the United Kingdom to interfere in a completely Canadian matter—to pass legislation which could have an effect on every Canadian. At the same time, we are saying that the U.K. Parliament must not interfere in what is a domestic, or Canadian, matter.

I have followed with interest the various speeches of senators and others learned in the law who have debated the matter of whether or not the federal government can proceed to have substantial changes made in our Constitution and the proposed Charter of Rights without the consent of the provinces, or at least a majority of them. Can the federal Parliament act in a unilateral manner to have the Parliament of the United Kingdom pass legislation when the majority of the provinces are opposed to such a course? This question is now before the courts and, I suppose, in due course, it will be before the Supreme Court of Canada for final decision. Personally, I do not like this approach.

Undoubtedly, there has been a continuous development in our constitutional history over the years, and especially over the past twenty or more years. Some sections of the B.N.A. Act have certainly become obsolete and a new relationship has developed between the federal and provincial governments. It is this development which is the cause, I think, of the major disagreements that now exist between the two levels of government.

There is nothing to gain from mutual recriminations. We must recognize that a new relationship has developed but that it is one which has not yet been defined, so there is still a good deal of room for disagreement. I think the present negotiations—if that is the proper term—between the federal and provincial governments, in trying to define their respective areas of authority, can be compared to negotiations between employers and employees over a labour agreement. Difficulties will and must, in time, be overcome and some kind of an agreement will eventually come about.

We cannot look to the past to find a solution to the problem of the relationship between the federal and provincial governments. What was suitable in 1867 is not suitable today. A new relationship, which would define the authority of each level of government as it has developed, must be accomplished by the elected representatives in the federal and provincial governments. This will be difficult since negotiations have been going on for some time without being wholly successful. Yet, as in labour disputes, I think they should continue and, in time, with goodwill and a spirit of compromise, some mutually satisfactory arrangement will be found.

I do believe that what is required is a political, and not a legal, solution to the present dispute between the two levels of government. In a legal decision, someone will win and someone will lose, and this does not make for a happy future relationship. Not only that, but in a legal dispute concerning the relationship between governments, I think there is a danger that our judicial system might be adversely affected. We are fortunate to have a fine judicial system and we do not want our judges to be placed in a position where people may feel one judge favours the federal authority and another the provincial authority.

Indeed, I have heard it predicted that if a reference were made to our Supreme Court certain judges would find in favour of the federal and others in favour of the provincial authority. It was not meant that they would consciously behave in an injudicial manner, but because of their legal and social background. So I feel that the federal government made a wrong decision when it decided to amend the Constitution on its own, and I hope that in time this can be corrected.

Honourable senators, I know it is not practical to discuss the various clauses contained in Schedule B of the Constitution Act. That schedule contains 65 clauses. However, I want to mention two. On January 21 last it was moved in committee that clause 1 of the proposed Constitution be amended to include a statement that the Canadian nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person, and the position of the family in a society of free individuals and free institutions. It went on to affirm that individuals and institutions remain free only when freedom is founded upon respect for moral and physical values and the role of law.

Honourable senators, I was astounded to read that this amendment was not acceptable to the government. It appeared to me that this was an amendment which would have had the support of the vast majority of the Canadian people, so I read with interest the reasons given for its rejection. So far as I could see, there were three, two of which were trivial and of no substance. The main objection raised was that since some Canadians do not believe in God, it would be unfair to them to have that affirmation in the charter, and it would amount to discrimination against them, the implication being, of course, that we must respect the opinion of the minority.

Honourable senators, I am all for respecting the rights of minorities, but we must not forget that the majority also have rights, and their rights deserve just as much respect as, if not more respect than, those of any minority group. If that argument were carried to its logical conclusion, there would be very few clauses in the charter which did not have a minority opinion in opposition. Indeed, there would be no charter attached to the resolution.

Honourable senators, I believe it was most unfortunate that no reference is made in the charter to the effect that Canadians, as a nation, acknowledge the supremacy of God. In speaking on the amendment, one member said:

> I believe this country of ours has been founded by people, who on the whole, believed in God and I believe that because of that common belief held by so many, many of the principles which made it possible for us to have a free society have basically come because of the spiritual values held by those generations of people who went before us.

I also quote a sentence from another speaker:

> Let us recognize the historic fact of Canada, and the historic fact of Canada is that this was a nation founded under God—this was a nation that respected the dignity and the worth of the human being.

Honourable senators, anyone with even the slightest knowledge of history must be aware of the historical fact that the pioneers who came to this country believed in God and acknowledged the supremacy of God. Practically the first thing those pioneers did was to build a church. So I was disappointed that the committee did not accept that amendment which, I think, would be more than acceptable to the vast majority of the Canadian people.

The other clause I wish to discuss for a few moments is clause 15, subclause 1, which reads:

> Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

On the face of it, that clause would not appear to be objectionable. But, honourable senators, strong objections have been taken to it, and I will tell you why. I understand that the original draft of that clause began as follows: "Everyone is equal; . . ." In committee the Minister of Justice proposed the amendment which changed the word "everyone" to "every individual", and it is this change which is strongly opposed by the various Right to Life groups. I understand that the change of wording was made at the request of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. The reason given for that request was the fear that the word "everyone" might be interpreted to include children before as well as after birth, and the council wanted to avoid that. Changing the wording led the pro-life groups to protest. Such groups feel, and I think rightly, that the amended wording is a victory for those who advocate abortion on demand.

I draw to your attention a letter dated February 11, 1981, sent to all members of Parliament by the Campaign Life group. This letter is somewhat detailed, and honourable senators may have read it. However, I would like to quote two paragraphs from it which show, in no uncertain terms, the reasons for the opposition of the pro-life groups. They read as follows:

> Our objection lies with S.15 of the Charter in which Mr. Chrétien ignored the recommendations of the pro-life groups in regard to protection of the life of the unborn child and instead accepted the recommendations of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. The purpose of this latter council's recommendation according to CP report, dated November 15, 1980, was to prevent "fetuses from having protection from the Charter," and to have entrenched into the Constitution total and complete "equal rights" for women.
> S.15 of the Charter will have a direct effect on the abortion issue in that it will be used by the pro-abortionists to bring about an enormously increased number of abortion facilities and abortion clinics (Statistics Canada reports that in 1979 alone 65,043 abortions were performed in Canada). The argument will be used that women in localities where abortions are available are allegedly being denied full "benefit of the (abortion law)" and therefore are being discriminated against contrary to S.15. This will either, (1) force the local hospitals to provide abortion facilities, or (2) force the Minister of Health for that province to set up abortion clinics which would be separate from and not responsible to any hospital. (Something the pro-abortionists have been pushing for years.)

In my opinion, the decision of the government not only to exclude the unborn from the protection of the charter but also its determination to entrench this exclusion in the charter is a deplorable and regrettable action.

Honourable senators, feeling as I do about the resolution, you will not be surprised to learn I do not propose to vote for it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, may I begin by congratulating Senator Macdonald on his living up to his usual standard of providing a thoughtful and stimulating contribution to this debate. Indeed, honourable senators, I have listened to all the speeches that have been made, and have read them all as well, and I believe that they are a great credit to the Senate and have added to the thought which we all have to give to this momentous and historic issue.

I would also like to offer my sincere congratulations to all of those who served with such dedication, tenacity and stamina on the joint committee. It sat for 300 hours, held 106 meetings and heard 314 witnesses. I felt that the joint chairmen particularly characterized the vitality and distinctiveness of Canada: there was the rugged individuality and affable informality of Senator Hays; and Mr. Joyal displayed all the urbane chivalry and perspicacity of his people.

I have already commended the senators who have already spoken. The quality of their speeches indicated the knowledge and experience which they bring to this critical and fundamental issue. I do not agree with all the arguments, but I must acknowledge their deep concern, their conviction and commitment to produce an even better and united Canada.

● (2100)

The committee has produced a substantial document which can result in significant ramifications on the fabric of our federal system and affect imposingly the lives of every Canadian in every hamlet and village from coast to coast.

What the Address to Her Majesty will accomplish is momentous and manifold. It would finally and irrevocably patriate our Constitution with a prescription for amending it to be decided in Canada, and it will also include the entrenchment of a Charter of Rights and language rights.

Let me quote Senator Connolly who, in the Senate in March 1971, defined the Constitution as follows:

> A constitution is more than just a statute of the legislature; it is the supreme law of the state. It is the basic premise upon which the political, the economic, the social and the juridical structure of the state is founded. To it all other law must conform, and to it all legislatures are subordinate. The constitution—

Senator Connolly said.

> —is the fundamental consensus—

I repeat that.

> —the fundamental consensus of a people for the life of a nation, the fundamental consensus of a nation for the life of a people.

I remember very clearly that speech, and as I listened to it I could not help thinking that over half a century before, in my former homeland—in the homeland of Senator Connolly's ancestors—there had not been that fundamental and essential consensus on the acceptance of one clause of the new articles of agreement for my homeland—their Constitution—and that lack of consensus resulted in violent confrontation, in a bitter, brutal civil war whose scars still bleed in the streets of the city where I was born. I thank God that in Canada our deepest national tradition and trait is exemplified in patience, tolerance and compromise when we are making amendments to our Constitution.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Thompson: In my less elegant and more homespun language, the Constitution is the rules of the game for each team and for each individual player.

I am proud to belong to a political party, the Liberal Party, but partisan play stops, I suggest, when as Canadians—not as Liberals, Conservatives, Social Crediters or New Democrats—we sit down to discuss the rules by which our vast and varied country will govern itself. I respectfully suggest to those who have brought up the flag debate that it is our national symbol.

It was certainly one issue that touched deeply the hearts and emotions of our people, but the choice of our national symbol did not, as this resolution will, significantly change the fundamental rules which govern us all.

Indeed, I recall the process that took place. Senator Olson described one of the approaches in arriving at a decision on the national flag and mentioned that there were over 42,000 written submissions and over 2,695 designs. I thought that was tremendous—citizenship participation at its best.

Citizenship participation was a rallying call for us Liberals not too long ago, and I hope that we shall look at the flag process in the course of this debate, not in terms of its being a symbol but rather as a process from which there evolved our national symbol—watching carefully, getting participation from across Canada, and then following strictly heraldic traditions in deciding on a design.

This Constitution debate is an historic occasion, which demands of us to speak out from our own deeply held individual convictions, and not to be silenced by any narrow partisan loyalties. I wish to say that no one has made any serious attempt to try to curb my expressing my own convictions with regard to this resolution. I have worried over, have been troubled about, and have studied this speech that I am making more than I have done in connection with any speech I have made in the past. I am not a sophisticated or learned constitutional lawyer as are some of my honourable colleagues—

Senator Marshall: But you are pretty good.

Senator Thompson: —and my questions are blunt and simple. Putting it bluntly and simply, my question is: Are we keeping our word; are we breaking the rules by which we agreed to govern ourselves in the federation? No matter how noble and worthy the purpose of this resolution—and I believe that what we are trying to achieve is worthy—the end does not justify the means.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Thompson: I know that no senator will argue, because the aims are so noble and worthy, "Let us ignore and abuse the means."

Honourable senators, I recall the time when I got my first job in Canada. I was in my early teens. It was during the first years of the Second World War, and Toronto University had permitted me leave of three weeks to help with the prairie harvest. I was a skinny, small boy compared with the older students with whom I went out to Lucky Lake, Saskatchewan—which I know an honourable senator in this chamber will recognize well.

I recall that I stood in the centre of the square of that little town, and I was the last to be chosen. I felt very awkward about that, standing there and hoping that someone would choose me to help them with the harvest. Then a Mr. MacGregor chose me.

When the harvest was completed and I was watering his horses out on the prairie, looking over that enormous expanse and watching the sun slowly setting, Mr. MacGregor came over to pay me. He was a homesteader and did not have very much money. I felt very guilty because I was scrawny and small, and not that effective. I said to Mr. MacGregor, "I was a poor worker; you do not need to pay me these wages." Mr. MacGregor was a blunt man. He said, "You were indeed." Then he added with a note of pride and determination in his voice, "Remember this, laddie, you're in Canada, and a man's word is his bond, poor bargain or nay."

Honourable senators, over the past weeks I have attempted to find out particularly what is the Canadian government's word on this amending procedure, poor bargain or nay.

We do not have a large staff, and I commend my secretary, whom I share with Senator Steuart, for the work she has done, and also the Library research staff and, indeed, some honourable senators who have helped me obtain some background material on this subject. I have read the Kershaw report and all the different briefs that were submitted, and at times I have read all through the night, to the concern of my wife who thinks that I may be getting mentally disturbed over this issue.

Perhaps, with all my homework, I should have followed the advice of Judge Begbie in the last century who said, "The statute books are exceedingly muddled. I seldom look at them."

• (2110)

Honourable senators, my deep concern is not with the substance of the resolution, but rather with the procedure being followed. I have stated that concern to the government through the traditional channels of the caucus, the Senate caucus, the National Liberal caucus, and now I am stating it on the floor of the house.

I want to thank Senator Austin, in particular, and Senator Lamontagne, because both of them focused, to a certain extent in their speeches, on the unilateral procedure being adopted by the federal government, and they realize that this is a matter that worries me, and worries many Canadians.

Senator Lamontagne, in his usual masterful, erudite manner, provided a powerful, persuasive and unique argument to justify the unilateral procedure, namely, that the means indeed do justify the end. Senator Lamontagne argued:

> In other words, there is no legal requirement and no binding convention that prevents the Canadian Parliament from adopting, without the consent of the provinces, a joint resolution asking the United Kingdom Parliament to amend the B.N.A. Act, even with respect to matters affecting federal-provincial relationships or provincial powers.

In other words, a majority of both houses of Parliament can have unfettered power over the provinces.

Senator Lamontagne, in order to substantiate this viewpoint, quoted a very impressive list of academics, such as Professor Kennedy and Norman Rogers in 1935, both talking about the lack of a strict legal requirement.

Senator Lamontagne also quoted Professor Gil Rémillard of Laval University, and went on further to quote Professor Scott, who also said that there is no legal necessity for consulting the provinces. He then reached back to Dr. O. D. Skelton, in 1935, who said:

> All that was sought to do in 1931 was to ensure that for the time being the status quo was not altered by the Statute of Westminster as regards constitutional amendment.

Senator Lamontagne argued what was to me an innovative approach to this whole concept of federalism. He suggested that despite the fact that there are six provinces before the courts now, in the process of trying to stop the federal government from proceeding with this resolution, the Canadian Parliament must no longer retain this unlimited power to amend the Constitution by itself, and that if we were to follow the method proposed by the federal government, as set out in the resolution, we would be giving a guarantee to the provinces of their rights.

Mr. Chrétien, before the special joint committee, also expressed this view, talking of the British government and saying that the B.N.A. Act is British law, and telling us that we have to bring it back because, as he said:

> It is, after all, a British law. The British Parliament could, probably, if they wanted, do almost anything with our Constitution.

Indeed, if we were to follow to a logical conclusion the strict legal argument of Senator Lamontagne and Mr. Chrétien, we would have to assume, in fact, that we never had a Canadian federation; yet, of course, we know we did, and I know that Senator Lamontagne would agree with me. The preamble of the B.N.A. Act of 1867 states that Canada is a federation, and not a unitary state. Let me quote:

> Whereas the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their Desire to be federally united into One Dominion under the Crown—

Viscount Haldane authoritatively stated, referring to the background of the B.N.A. Act:

> The scheme of the Act passed in 1867 was thus not to weld the provinces into one, nor to subordinate provincial governments to a central authority, but to establish a central government in which these provinces should be represented, entrusted with exclusive authority only in affairs in which they had a common interest.

If we were to follow the logic of Senator Lamontagne and the Honourable Jean Chrétien, we would be entitled to ask why, in the light of the fact that since 1927 there have been ten first ministers' conferences on the amendment of the Constitution, the federal government, in the past, has not used this legal power that it is suggested it has? I would like to answer that by a quotation from someone who, I know, all Liberals revere, and who is revered, I am sure, by all of us. I am referring, of course, to the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent. Senator Macquarrie may recognize this as a textbook by one of his heroes, MacGregor Dawson, who also taught me. At page 133 of the fourth edition of this text, the author says:

> The legal and conventional position as it still exists was accurately stated by Mr. St. Laurent, the Minister of Justice, when the proposed 1946 amendment was before the House. In reply to a query whether Section 133 (regarding the use of the English or French languages in Canada and Quebec) could be altered without provincial consent, he said:

> Legally I say it can. The situation appears to me to be this. There are persons and nations who reach a high estate in the affairs of men, and the high estate they reach imposes upon them high obligations. . . I feel—and I believe my fellow Canadians of my race and religion can feel—that a better guarantee than anything that might be found in Section 133 is to be found in that respect, for those who have been formed under the principles of British freedom and British fair play, to protect what are our essential rights.
> It is not the manner of those who have themselves had, and whose ancestors have had, the formation that comes from that long history which has brought us to this point in the civilization of mankind, to do things which the conscience of humanity at large would regard as dishonourable; and the conscience of humanity at large would frown upon an assemblage in this house that attempted to take from me and from those of my race the right to speak the language I learned in my infancy as one of the official languages in which the deliberations of this house may be carried on. So it is of everything else that is not within Section 92. If it is fair, if it is just, if it is proper according to the standards of human decency, it will be done; if it is unfair, if it is unjust, if it is improper, all members of this house will say, "It is not our manner to do such things."

Obviously, the standards which the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent used are not those of a narrow, legalistic definition, which is the one arrived at by Senator Lamontagne in his use of the quotations from his esteemed academic authorities. The question that the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent was asking was: "Is it fair, is it just, is it proper, according to the standards of human decency?"

Honourable senators, I am concerned that this resolution to patriate and amend our Constitution should have just those qualities which Mr. St. Laurent emphasized. My concern is not because of any particular sympathy towards some of the provincial premiers' viewpoints as expressed at the recent constitutional conference. Frankly, I was appalled at the parochial character of the views expressed by some of them, in spite of the fact that, like Senator Austin, I do recognize that they should and do represent provincial interests within a federal Canada. My concern is most assuredly not born of my belief in more decentralization. Our country, in my view, is already dangerously decentralized. My concern is rather with regard to the very basic issue, namely, the sanctity of our federal principle.

Let me quote the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson in The Amendment of the Constitution of Canada (1965) in which, at page vii, he says:

• (2120)

> In any federation, the two most critical questions are the distribution of powers between the two levels of government and the manner in which the Constitution can be changed. A federation is necessarily a delicate balance between conflicting considerations and interests. It is to be expected that the most delicate of all questions should be the way in which such a balance might be altered.

Some of you may recall the words of Sir Ivor Jennings in Constitution Laws of the Commonwealth, (1957):

> The essence of federalism is a division of powers between a central and local legislature that the central legislature has no power to alter. If this test is applied, the Constitution of Canada is certainly federal.

Why am I concerned, honourable senators? It may be because of my own background; where I have come from. I have seen a homeland where there was not a consensus of the people, and I have seen what resulted when a constitution was brought back from England to my former country.

Dr. Edward McWhinney, who has studied and written on the general principles of constitutionalism in the English-speaking world, and who appeared before the joint committee, emphasized that constitution-making and its subsequent operation demanded a substantial consensus of the people. Professor Lederman wrote in his article "Changing Canada's Constitution":

> The basic provisions of a country's Constitution are first principles that develop out of the whole course of its history about the right way to do things.

I would like to say that I am not attempting to expound the "compact theory" because I agree with MacGregor Dawson, my former professor, when he said that the compact theory is constructed on sheer invention, without any legal or historical foundation. What I am discussing is the basic principle of federalism rather than any contractual arrangement between various governments which we are discussing. It is a matter not of a "federal compact", but of a federal principle. Therefore, when we look at the procedure to see whether the federal principle is being honoured, I know that Senator Lamontagne, in his most able and scholarly speech, argued that:

> In no case has the U.K. Parliament refused an amendment because the consent of the provinces had not been obtained or accepted an amendment upon a provincial request.

I accept his statement, but I also checked the history of proposed amendments to the Constitution which would affect the legislative powers of the provinces. I found that no amendment which affected the legislative sovereignty of the provinces was sought without the consent of all the provinces.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Thompson: Indeed—and I wish Senator Lamontagne or others would inform me if I am wrong—there were only two such amendments in which there was not unanimous consent. There was the 1930 amendment which contained the natural resources agreements between the federal government and the Governments of Manitoba, British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan. Those were the four provinces directly affected, and all agreed to the amendment. Senator Dandurand, on behalf of the federal government, explained that consent in principle had been given by all the provinces at a conference of federal and provincial governments in 1927.

The other amendment was that of 1907, which assigned higher federal subsidies to the provinces from those established in 1867. It was approved by eight of the provinces, but not consented to by British Columbia, whose premier, Premier McBride, according to Dr. Gerin Lajoie, was motivated by "a claim for better claims." Because of Senator Lamontagne's brilliant and erudite speech, which kept me reading all through the weekend, I know that he stated that in 1978, the Honourable Ron Basford and the Honourable Marc Lalonde had reviewed past practices and they had stated that, though the provinces' consent was sought in 1940, 1951 and 1964, constitutionally this was not obligatory. Well, I would like to read the white paper entitled, "The Amendment of the Constitution of Canada, 1965," detailing the approach taken by the Government of Canada to constitutional amendment, "which finally produced a unanimously acceptable solution," the Fulton-Favreau formula. Let me quote from pages 45, 46 and 47:

> . . . The very nature of the federation requires that the rights and powers of its constituent units be protected . . . It may be argued that a requirement of unanimity is too inflexible to be applied to the distribution of legislative powers, but this distribution is basic to the Canadian federation. In fact, in the 97 years that have elapsed since Confederation, no amendment has altered the powers of provincial legislatures under section 92 of the British North America Act without the consent of all the provinces.
> This clearly reflects a basic and historic fact in Canadian constitutional affairs. The Constitution cannot be changed in a way that might deprive provinces of their legislative powers unless they consent. The law has not said so, but the facts of national life have imposed the unanimity requirement, and experience since Confederation has established it as a convention that a government or Parliament would disregard at its peril.

Perhaps, honourable senators, to indicate that there are others who have studied this question, I can refer to one who, I think we all recognize, has spent a great deal of his life considering constitutional affairs, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau. I quote a letter that he sent to the premiers, dated March 31, 1976, in which he wrote:

> In practice, of course, the federal government has in the past sought the unanimous consent of the provinces before seeking amendments that have affected the distribution of powers.

Honourable senators, what has been the stated commitment of our Prime Minister as regards the provinces' consent to amendments? As I read out the following statements, honourable senators, I would like you to think in my simple terms, if you could, of that proud, independent old Scottish farmer, Mr. MacGregor. Let his simple words ring in your ears: "Remember, laddie, in Canada a man's word is his bond, poor bargain or nay." I believe that his chiselled, proud face represents the integrity of the people of Canada.

Let me quote Mr. Trudeau's words uttered at the federal-provincial constitutional conference on February 6, 1979—not very long ago. He was answering questions of the first ministers on the continuing process of constitutional reform, and said:

● (2130)

> So, will there be unilateral action by the federal government regardless of the result of this conference? Our priority would be to seek agreement and move in areas of federal and provincial concern where we could move together but if we are not successful I repeat we preserve our constitutional right to change our constitution, the federal one, just as the provinces keep their right to change their provincial constitutions and I do not think either the provinces or the federal government would want to give up that right . . . Our priority is to change this constitution collectively, federal and provincial . . . We will adopt a Charter of Human Rights, we will constitutionalize it. We cannot force the provinces to do it. We are trying to convince them to do it . . . I can answer unequivocally that the federal government intends to entrench a charter of basic human rights and of linguistic rights. Now, this will bind the federal government; it won't bind the provinces unless they want to bind themselves but here again we can under our constitution bind ourselves just as the provinces, many of you, have adopted Charters of Human Rights. Well, we have adopted one and we want to constitutionalize it.

On June 12, 1978, again the federal government had tabled in the House of Commons a government document entitled, A Time for Action: Toward the Renewal of the Canadian Federation. I am sure many of us have read that document. In it were set forth the proposals for renewal of the Canadian federation. Let me read to you from page 19 of chapter 5 of that document, in which the government gives us "the word":

> The government has resolved to provide Canada with a new Constitution by the end of 1981 . . . It urges the provinces to co-operate with it in order to renew the constitutional provisions which cannot be amended without their co-operation.

On March 31, 1976, the Prime Minister wrote to the premiers outlining alternative approaches towards patriating the Constitution with an amending formula. In his second alternative he proposed to detail a permanent and flexible amending procedure in, as he put it, "our Joint Address and having it included in the British legislation as an enabling provision that would come into effect when and only when it had received the formal approval of the legislatures of all the provinces . . ."

In his letter of March 31, 1976, he outlined a third alternative which follows closely the procedure adopted by this resolution:

> A third and more extensive possibility still, would be to include, in the "patriation" action, the entirety of the "Draft Proclamation" I am enclosing. In other words the British Parliament, in terminating its capacity to legislate for Canada, would provide that all of the substance of Parts I to VI would come into effect in Canada and would have full legal force when, and only when, the entirety of those Parts had been approved by the legislatures of all the provinces. At that point, we would have, not only "patriation" and the amending procedure, but also the other provisions that have developed out of the discussions thus far. Here again, of course, until all the Provinces had approved the entire Draft Proclamation, any constitutional change which did not come under Section 91(1) or Section 92(1) would be subject to unanimous consent.

Let us revert, honourable senators, to the Constitutional Conference of June 16, 1971, in the deliberations of which, I think we would all agree from both sides of the house, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau played such an outstanding role. As all of you know, the Victoria Charter contained, among other things, not only a formula for amending the Constitution but also provisions relating to the entrenchment of fundamental rights and language rights. Those rights were, indeed, similar in many ways to the provisions contained in the present resolution, although what is contained in the present resolution is, in my opinion, an improvement over the rights that were envisioned before.

With his superb talents, Mr. Trudeau almost had in his grasp the Holy Grail of amending procedure as well as these other provisions. Unfortunately, on June 23, 1971, the Quebec government could not accept the charter because of the wording of certain clauses dealing with income security. Because of Quebec's dissenting voice, therefore, the new Premier of Saskatchewan—where they had just held a provincial election—did not proceed to have the charter accepted in his legislature. After all the other provincial governments had announced that the charter had been accepted, the Saskatchewan legislature did not go ahead.

I remember those days well, honourable senators, because we had had a good debate in the Ontario legislature, and I also had the privilege of debating the matter on national television with that outstanding, stimulating Canadian, whom we all knew and admired, irrespective of the side of the house we were on, Daniel Johnson.

In 1971 there was no question whatsoever that the federal government would proceed to have the charter enacted, despite the fact that only one province had dissented. Indeed, let me quote the Right Honourable Prime Minister Trudeau with respect to that:

> Despite the failure to secure the unanimous agreement that had been hoped for, the Charter . . . represents the most significant and comprehensive development in the search for a basis of constitutional revision since Confederation.

If I may interrupt the quotation, I should like to say I agree with him. Now I continue:

> It is hoped that it may still provide the foundation for agreement in order that the Constitution may be "repatriated" and made amendable entirely in Canada.

Well, I have given you some of the words of the Right Honourable Prime Minister Trudeau concerning this amending procedure. Let me go back to another prime minister who, I am sure, is endeared in the hearts of everyone, but perhaps particularly in the hearts of Liberals. I should like to quote from The Pearson Years in The Liberal Party of Canada, its Philosophy and History. You all recall the concept of co-operative federalism. That is not a term you hear much these days, but for many of us it was a great rallying call. Listen to this quotation from that work:

> In order to counter growing dissension and to strengthen national unity, the Liberal government formulated the policy of co-operative federalism. This was defined as "co-operation between Ottawa and the provinces at three levels, pre-consultation in the formulation of federal policies, collaboration in the drafting of these policies, and co-ordination in their implementation."

Before I continue, may I refer to Senator Lamontagne's comments on the Fulton-Favreau "fourth principle." Senator Lamontagne suggested that the document does not say that the fourth principle has gained recognition, but is only gaining "increasing" recognition and acceptance. He referred to the nature of degree of participation in the amending formula not lending itself to easy definition. Well, as long ago as 1956, in replying to questions in the House of Commons, the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, on January 20 of that year, responded to a question by the Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker concerning the Fulton-Favreau formula.

● (2140)

Mr. Pearson said:

> My right honourable friend also referred to the fact that we said very little in the Speech from the Throne about constitutional amendment, and that we seemed to have dropped the Fulton-Favreau formula. We have not dropped it, Mr. Speaker. We shall do our best to put it into effect if and when we get the agreement of all the provinces, but without that agreement it cannot be done.

Let us refresh our minds on the white paper published in 1965 by the Honourable Guy Favreau, the then Minister of Justice. It included four general principles. The fourth principle reads:

> That the Canadian Parliament will not request an amendment directly affecting federal-provincial relationships without prior consultation and agreement with the provinces. This principle did not emerge as early as others but since 1907, and particularly since 1930, has gained increasing recognition and acceptance. The nature and the degree of provincial participation in the amending process, however, have not lent themselves to easy definition.

These were the words to which Senator Lamontagne referred, but I would suggest, honourable senators, that the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson seemed to have no difficulty, in his answer to the Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker, in understanding the implications of that fourth principle. The Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent, in his opening statement at the constitutional conference of federal and provincial governments of 1950 to define an amending formula, stated:

> —it is, and has always been, the view of the present federal government that the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces which gives a federal character to the Constitution of Canada must be respected.
> I should like to repeat again the opinion I have expressed on many occasions that, regardless of the legal position, nothing placed by the Constitution under the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature should be dealt with or altered without provincial participation.

And he goes on further to emphasize that point. He describes how he expressed a similar view in the House of Commons on July 5, 1943 and on May 28, 1946. Mr. St. Laurent said:

> It has always been my view that any procedure for amendment of the joint portion of the Constitution must make proper provision for participation by both the federal and the provincial authorities.

Senator Lamontagne, in his speech, referred to that 1950 dominion-provincial conference and the remarks of Premier McNair of New Brunswick, which he used to indicate that several provincial premiers believe that there is no constitutional convention which obliges the Canadian government to seek the consent of the provinces.

Over the weekend, I read Premier McNair's speech. In discussing the method of repatriation and an amending formula, he said:

> In my view the Constitution of Canada should not be within the unfettered control of the Parliament of Canada or of any other legislative body. The Constitution of Canada and the power of amendment thereof should rest on a deeper basis than the will of a single legislative body.

He went on to say:

> These methods however require unanimous agreement on the part of the dominion and the provinces, otherwise there can be no treaty upon which the new Constitution may be founded.

And further on in his speech he said:

> Any change in the amending procedure should, of necessity, require their unanimous consent.

And by "their" he was referring to the provinces. With the greatest respect, I say to Senator Lamontagne that his choice of the speech of Premier McNair to support his comment that provincial premiers do not adhere to the theory of provincial consent—

Senator Flynn: Shame.

Senator Asselin: Shame, Maurice.

Senator Thompson: —does not seem quite as substantial after reading Premier McNair's speech.

Let me go back to the Right Honourable Mackenzie King, who formally approved these words uttered by his Minister of Justice, Mr. Lapointe. It was in 1925 and Mr. Lapointe was speaking on a motion for the enactment by the U.K. Parliament of a measure vesting the Parliament of Canada with the power of constitutional amendment. Before I read that quotation I would like to remind honourable senators of a comment by Senator Lamontagne on a statement by Mr. Lapointe, which was to the effect that provincial consent is not necessary but may be desirable. In 1925 Mr. Lapointe said:

> The British North America Act itself is not only the charter of the Dominion of Canada; it is just as much the charter of the provinces of Canada . . . Would it then be fair for us to arrogate to ourselves the right to change the act which is just as much the Constitution of the provinces as it is our own? . . . Within their sphere the provinces enjoy the powers of self-government just as much as the dominion Parliament does, and if so, surely the dominion Parliament cannot take upon itself the right to change a statute which gives to those provinces the powers which they enjoy—

Honourable senators, I suggest that those remarks are a little stronger than the statement by Mr. Lapointe which Senator Lamontagne quoted.

Senator Flynn: Selected.

Senator Lamontagne: He said the opposite in 1940.

Senator Thompson: I could continue back through the pages of Canadian history reading statements by the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker and other former Prime Ministers, or their federal spokesmen, right back to 1867. I hope that Senator Lamontagne, whom I respect deeply, does not mind that his remarks are being used as the substance of my discussion.

In his opening remarks Senator Lamontagne corrected Senator Macquarrie who had been quoting Sir John A. Macdonald by saying that Sir John A. Macdonald had no high regard for the provinces. Indeed, he would like to see them as municipalities. However, even though Sir John A. Macdonald had no high regard for the provincial legislatures, he disapproved strongly of any infringement upon the provisions of the British North America Act which would interfere with the rights of the different provinces of the dominion. And in that regard I would refer Senator Lamontagne to House of Commons Debates of April 8, 1875, where Sir John A. Macdonald says he:

> —deprecated any infringement on the provisions of the B.N.A. Act which would interfere with the rights of the different provinces of the dominion.

I am almost tempted to throw in a quote by Mr. Stanley Knowles which I feel would be fitting in indicating my position. However, I will not do that, but I assure honourable senators that it is there. It will be interesting to see where Mr. Knowles stands in the vote. I know that he is a man of strong principles, and I do not think that he will be swayed.

There have been many serious attempts to find an amending formula—in 1927, 1935, 1936, 1950, 1961, 1964, 1968, 1971—and in each conference the federal government refrained from proceeding with a joint resolution to the U.K. government because of a lack of unanimous agreement among the provinces. In some cases there was only one province dissenting.

But federalism is a fragile form of government, as expressed by Prime Minister Trudeau who wrote an article in Federalism and the French-Canadians, which had also been published in Social Purposes for Canada (1961). Incidentally, I treasure that publication in which Mr. Trudeau writes with great lucidity and logic, and frankly, I wish that I had had the privilege and opportunity of studying under him. Prime Minister Trudeau, in that article, wrote:

● (2150)

> But at all times, co-operation and interchange between the two levels of government will be, as they have been an absolute necessity.

I will quote further from this article since I think you will find it to be of interest. In fairness, I would stress that Mr. Trudeau wrote the article in 1961 when the federal government, through its financial powers, was encouraging the provinces to accept a medicare program and a contributory pension plan, of both of which I am very proud. Many felt that if such national social policies continued, the provincial powers, to initiate their own priorities, could be eroded. I believe it was on that basis that Mr. Trudeau was writing this article.

On page 148 of the book I referred to, Mr. Trudeau argued against the centralizing policies of socialists. He stated:

> And there is surely some good in trying to improve upon, or modernize, the rational but perhaps aging division of powers adopted by the Fathers of Confederation. I am inclined to believe, however, that Canadian socialists have exaggerated the urgency of rewriting or reinterpreting the B.N.A. Act. Most of the reforms that could come about through greater centralization could also follow from patient and painstaking co-operation between federal and provincial governments. And the remaining balance of economic advantage that might arise from forcefully transferring more power to the central government is easily offset by the political disadvantages of living under a paternalistic or bullying government. Granted the foregoing statement, it is difficult to see why socialists devote such energy to constitutional might-have-been's or ought-to-be's, instead of generally accepting the constitution as a datum. From the point of view of "making available to all what we desire for ourselves," it is not of such momentous consequence that the subject matter of some particular law falls within the jurisdiction of the federal as opposed to the provincial governments, since in either case the governments are responsible to one electorate or another. In other words, laws—whether they issue from one central government or from ten provincial governments—benefit the same sets of citizens. The only important thing, then, is that these latter clearly know which level of government is responsible for what area of legislation, so that they may be aroused to demand good laws from all their governments.
> This would not prevent socialist parties from stating in certain limited cases that reforms might be carried out more efficiently if the constitution were amended. But in such cases, amendments would be clearly mentioned, and not sly encroachments which inevitably result in confusing the electorate as to which level of government is responsible for what. Nor would the proposed amendments all, and as a matter of course, tend to be in the direction of centralization.
> For example again, when socialists advocate a constitutional amendment enacting a bill of rights for all Canadians and all governments in Canada, they might simultaneously advocate the abolition of the federal right to disallow and to reserve provincial laws, since such safeguards would then be obsolete.

Honourable senators, each of us, in our conscience, has to decide whether the eight premiers against this resolution—six of them involved in court proceedings against this measure—are taking this action because they feel they are living under a paternalistic or bullying government. Are we exaggerating the urgency of rewriting or reinterpreting the B.N.A. Act? Are we practising sly encroachments with our dubious doctrine of asking the British Parliament, if it dare, to judge the propriety of the resolution rather than relying on a decision from the Supreme Court of Canada?

Remember, honourable senators, no Prime Minister in our history has dared to break the rules of our fragile federation. What deeply concerns me, frankly, is that wretched Kirby paper—which I accept was only one of several position papers prepared by the bureaucracy—and, for no reason I can understand, we are adhering to the Kirby procedure. It states:

> There would be a strong strategic advantage in having the joint resolution passed and the U.K. legislation enacted before a Canadian court had occasion to pronounce on the validity of the measure and the procedure employed to achieve it. This would suggest the desirability of swift passage of the resolution and U.K. legislation.

Honourable senators, I will turn very briefly to the question of convention raised by Senator Lamontagne. I have read Sir Ivor Jennings' explanation of constitutional convention which includes the statement:

> —providing the flesh which clothe the dry bones of the law.

In his text, The Law and the Constitution, at page 136, he suggests three questions:

(1) What are the precedents?

(2) Did the actors in the precedents believe that they were bound by a rule?

(3) Is there a reason for the rule?

There were conflicting opinions about a Constitution convention being clearly established by learned witnesses who appeared before the special joint committee. As Senator Lamontagne pointed out, Professor La Forest made a strong case against a full-blown and operative convention being established.

On the other hand, Professor Wade, an eminent scholar of constitutional law and a Professor of English Law at the University of Cambridge, argued that the fourth principle contained in the 1965 white paper was concurred in, as he understood, "by all of the provinces before it was published and, therefore, is a convention in the most literal sense of the term, agreed to by all parties."

Honourable senators, I would quote the Right Honourable Pierre Trudeau who is certainly a constitutional expert. He said:

> In practice, of course, the federal government has in the past sought the unanimous consent before seeking amendments that have affected the distribution of powers.

Practice may not be a convention, and it is a too thorny and a too difficult field for a layman like myself to possibly give a decision on, but I would urge all of us to consider Senator Austin's creed contained in his passionate and brilliant speech. He said:

> Justice must not only be done but must be seen to be done.

Why do we not let the Supreme Court decide on the validity of this resolution and on the questions Senator Lamontagne and others have raised? Why the haste?

I find it hard to understand those who have—and no doubt others will—spoken with great passion on the necessity and urgency to enshrine our rights because they do not trust their Parliament or their legislatures, and feel the matter must be decided by the courts. Yet, in connection with this matter of momentous importance the supreme law which will govern all governments—they argue, in essence, to ignore the process of law in Canada, and to ignore and forget that six premiers have taken this resolution before the Canadian courts. I honestly hope that some of those who may follow me will explain the reason for such haste, and, if not, explain the inherent contradiction between their statement and their action in connection with this resolution. I might even suggest that from now on, the advocates of pushing through the resolution at least qualify their positions by stating, "I believe the courts must be the supreme and final arbitrator of our rights but not, on this occasion, of judging the propriety of this resolution."

● (2200)

Perhaps the advocates might ponder on the role of the Supreme Court with respect to Bill C-60. Why did they advocate sending the question of the role of the Senate to the Supreme Court for adjudication, and not advocate patience to allow the Supreme Court of Canada to decide on this resolution which affects all the people and all levels of government in Canada? If, in their advocacy, they draw on the decision of the Manitoba Supreme Court alone, I ask them if it is not logical to continue such reliance on the process of law and permit that process to proceed right through to the Supreme Court of Canada.

For those who are advocating the protection of the minorities through the authority of court decisions rather than those of Parliament and legislatures, I ask them, particularly those in the Senate, to consider their ambiguity towards minorities, the provinces. Think of little Prince Edward Island. I do not know if many of you have read the brief of Prince Edward Island to the United Kingdom parliamentary committee. It had to rush over to the Foreign Affairs Committee of the United Kingdom House of Commons because we, the senators of Canada, their protectors, may ignore their right to have their case heard in the Supreme Court of Canada prior to the enactment of this resolution.

Let me just quote for you a few words from the brief:

> It is submitted that the United Kingdom's role as trustee of the B.N.A. Acts must be as unpleasant for your country as it is unpleasant for P.E.I. to oppose, in the forum of your committee, a probable course of action by the Government of Canada.

Honourable senators may argue that this resolution will not affect the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. I find that hard to accept, despite the one provincial supreme court decision. The second amendment of the B.N.A. Act in 1949 gave Parliament the power to amend the Constitution in matters within its sole jurisdiction. Why does the government not then use this authority if there is no interference in provincial jurisdiction?

Let me read the federal government's explanatory notes which accompanied the bill:

> An entrenched Charter of Rights and Freedoms will limit the power of Parliament and provincial legislatures to pass laws or take actions that contravene or restrict unduly these guaranteed rights of Canadians.

Senator Frith: What is so sly about that? It is pretty straightforward.

Senator Asselin: Oh, come on!

Senator Flynn: Come on!

Senator Thompson: I am not talking about that being sly. I wish you would follow more closely, Senator Frith, and I hope you will read my speech.

Senator Frith: I will.

Senator Thompson:

> In this sense, therefore, power of the legislatures, including the Parliament in Ottawa will be restricted.

Let me read section 31 of the proposed charter:

31.(1) This Charter applies (a) to the Parliament and government of Canada and to all matters within the authority of Parliament including all matters relating to the Yukon Territory and Northwest Territories; and (b) to the legislature and government of each province and to all matters within the authority of the legislature of each province.

(2) Notwithstanding subsection (1), section 15 shall not have effect until three years after this Act, except Part VI, comes into force.

Certainly, all the provinces understand that this charter's purpose is—

Senator Frith: So does everybody else.

Senator Thompson: I think you are missing the point, Senator Frith, and I hope you will read my speech rather than interrupt me continuously.

Senator Flynn: It wouldn't be the first time.

Senator Asselin: It wouldn't be the first time he has missed the important parts.

Senator Thompson: Certainly, all the provinces understand that this charter's purpose is to limit legislative jurisdiction by rendering inoperative provincial laws, which are, in the judgment of the court, inconsistent with the charter. The fact that it will also limit federal jurisdiction does not alter that fact of infringing on provincial jurisdiction.

I am not talking about slyness; I am talking simply about the basic fact that I consider this charter will infringe on provincial jurisdiction.

Senator Frith: So does everybody else.

Senator Flynn: He doesn't want to understand.

Senator Thompson: One of the provinces' many questions is:—

Senator Flynn: His mind is blocked.

Senator Thompson: —Will freedom or religion interfere with provincial and municipal legislation concerning the closing of stores on Sundays and provincial aid to denominational schools? I would assume that we have provincial administration with respect to mental illness.

I remember writing a speech in days long ago for the Honourable Paul Martin, the then Minister of Health and Welfare, and having to avoid the suggestion that the federal government had the responsibility for the mentally ill; that this was a provincial concern. And yet in our Charter of Rights we now include this. The point I am making is that we are going to require the provincial governments to spend three years in bringing their laws into line with a charter in which they themselves have had no input officially.

Honourable senators, I want to deal with the Bill of Rights, but I have taken up far too much of your time.

Senator Smith: Not at all; not at all.

Senator Thompson: Perhaps I will continue then. I appreciate your encouragement.

[Senator Thompson.]

One of the difficulties of talking about the charter is that people assume that if you discuss it with some apprehension or concern you do not believe in minority rights. Honourable senators, I find it annoying to hear that, but I intend to take a back seat to no senator in this chamber concerning fighting for the rights of minorities.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Thompson: When I was a provincial member I was trying to help the Italians in my riding. I spent a week living with an unemployed Italian family, dressing as shabbily as I could, and walking around to see the kind of treatment they were receiving. Following my experience, Pierre Berton wrote a series of three articles in the Star, and Premier Frost mentioned to me that I had shown him some of the needs of those minorities. As a result, the Ontario legislature enacted some safety legislation. I could go on about my fight for many minority groups across Canada.

Senator Austin focussed on Japanese Canadians. When I was doing graduate work at the University of British Columbia, one of my research papers was on the odious laws that the British Columbia legislature had with respect to Asiatics, and the struggle that took place to try to achieve their naturalization. Although I believe other senators have done a great deal with minorities, I believe I am the only one in the Senate who has hanging in his office—and I am proud of it—an inscribed poem donated to me by former internees at a Japanese internment camp. It speaks of their struggle to achieve citizenship. It says:

As final resting place
Canada is chosen.
On citizenship papers,
Signing
Hand Trembles.

In questioning the validity of entrenching our Charter, I do so hoping that no one is going to suggest that I do not have a deep and consuming interest in minority groups. I discard as irrelevant the argument that the Soviet Union and other tyrannies of the right or left may have enshrined inspiring noble charters.

As an editorial in the Financial Post pointed out:

> The Soviet bill of rights includes such qualifiers as 'enjoyment by citizens of their rights and freedoms must not be to the detriment of the interests of society or the state' and 'the freedoms of speech, the press and assembly are granted in accordance with the interests of the people and in order to strengthen and develop the socialist system'.

In other words, to bring up the Soviet charter and to try to equate the Canadian people with the Soviet communist system is like comparing oranges and sour grapes.

I think it is more reasonable for us, when we look at entrenchment of rights, to look at the Commonwealth. I looked at the Commonwealth to see where rights had been entrenched. I found that the United Kingdom had not entrenched them, that New Zealand had not, and that Australia had not. Then I found that India had, and I thought, "Well, I won't ponder very long on India as far as guaranteeing rights is concerned." So I thought that perhaps the fairest thing I could do would be to go to the American Bill of Rights. The United States is a country that has a similar background of tradition and values.

When I was in the United States and did some research in social welfare, particularly in child welfare, I recall reading a book called The Dead Hand of the Law. I tried to get it, and I could not. In the book it described the blocking by Supreme Court decisions of the abolition of the frightful and appalling conditions of child labour. Professor Browne, whom Senator Cook referred to, pointed out that the rights to "liberty" and "enjoyment of property" which were applied by the American Supreme Court through its interpretation of the "due process clause" disallowed laws imposing maximum hours and minimum wage standards, prohibiting discrimination against trade unionists.

Then I thought of the outrages committed in the McCarthy era. Where were the enshrined rights that the Americans had to protect them from changes made only on the basis of association? What about the treatment of blacks and, indeed, of their own Japanese Americans, to mention some who thought that their rights were secure and guaranteed by entrenchment?

Frankly, I wish I felt the excitement that others profess to feel over the transfer of protecting rights to the courts from the sovereignty of Parliament and the legislatures. I believe that the rationale, the explanation, for that transfer needs much less emotional rhetoric and more deliberation by all of us.

There are great libertarians who are uneasy about this transfer. I could quote from the McRuer Commission in 1969, and I could quote D'Arcy McGee, admired by Senator Riley, who stated:

> There is more liberty and tolerance enjoyed by minorities in Canada than in the U.S.

A. V. Dicey, in the nineteenth century, wrote that a written Constitution was inferior because it would only act as a brake on the liberal spirit with which he expected Parliament to be imbued forever.

I also recognize and agree that the legislatures have not had a proud record. I would hope that there would be an entrenched Bill of Rights, but that it would compliment the work of the legislatures. I would go along with that. But I do not have enormous aspirations as to what it is going to do for us immediately.

I would like us to think of the alternatives before we take this final course. There have been approaches made to us in this regard. Senator Cook mentioned Professor Browne and his idea of having a priority of rights. That might be something worth looking at. Priority of rights should be further examined, because it is important.

Another matter that concerns me is the reference to a referendum. Frankly, I feel that a referendum is foreign to our system. I have looked at Australia's experience with referendum as a means of amending its Constitution. Quoting from an exhaustive work on the subject by Don Aitkin entitled "Referendum: A Comparative Study of Practice and Theory", he refers to Australia's experience as being, on the whole, a dismaying one.

I am sure that all honourable senators know the arguments against having a referendum: it weakens the power of elective authorities; the inability of ordinary citizens to have the time to study. These are all arguments against it. There is the inability of ordinary citizens to study complex issues. I can say, with respect to this issue, that if it were not for the fact that I am a senator and have been able to devote my time to it, I really could not spend the time in delving into such a complex subject to make rational decisions. There is no measurement of intensity of feeling. I hope that the proponents of minority rights will pause and think a bit about any reference to a referendum, because with the intensity of belief there is no means of a compromising consensus, and minorities are in real danger when it is the majority rule that will decide, when the decision will be by majority vote only.

Because of the necessity for a consensus in reaching agreement on this resolution, I would like to ask the government the following question, because there is concern expressed by the provinces that we are usurping their sovereignty through the use of a referendum: Would the government consider that the use of a further referendum to solve a deadlock be dropped and placed on the agenda of the First Ministers' Conference after the enactment of the resolution? I say that with deep sincerity and appreciation that the government has shown considerable flexibility toward amendments. We should remember that the joint committee adopted 67 amendments altogether.

Honourable senators, why am I so deeply concerned about this resolution? Principally it is because, to my mind, the resolution does not have the credibility of public consensus or the eligibility of provincial consent which raises the question: What will occur when the resolution reaches the British Parliament.

I would hope that the British—and I am sure Senator Lamontagne agrees—will look on it in the way that the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent looked at Newfoundland when that province entered Confederation. As honourable senators know, when that province voted to enter Confederation there arose the question as to whether it should have responsible government prior to taking that step. The question was asked of Mr. St. Laurent in the House of Commons, to which he replied that he felt the question of responsible government was a matter for the British government, and that it was not proper for him to interfere with respect to that. I hope that the British Parliament will adopt the same kind of approach with regard to the resolution that is sent to them.

If the British Parliament decides that the resolution is procedurally proper and enacts it, and later the Supreme Court decides that the act is not valid, what will be the situation? Dr. La Forest, the authority mentioned by Senator Lamontagne, pointed out that:

> —the act would be valid in the United Kingdom; the United Kingdom would have abdicated its power. We would be left in a judicially created limbo from which it would be hard, if not impossible, to extricate ourselves by legal means.

Honourable senators, constitutional experts far more knowledgeable and objective than I are perplexed over what this resolution will do to our federation. I refer you to Professor Wade, Professor of English law at Cambridge University, a world recognized authority on constitutional law, who when he was before the British Foreign Affairs Committee stated:

> The federal government cannot take away the powers of the province. This is something which the Government of the United States is unable to do, and the Government of Australia is unable to do. It is absolutely fundamental to a federal country, and if Canada is to remain a federal country that must be the situation.

● (2220)

Honourable senators, as I am sure you all know, I have anguished over making this speech, and I am sure that many other senators must have anguished over theirs. I am sure, too, that Maxwell Cohen must have been deeply troubled when he wrote the article in the Globe and Mail, which I am going to quote, about the lack of consensus that we see in Canada today. I think he believes in the substance of the resolution, and in the entrenchment of the Charter of Rights, but in his article in the Globe and Mail of February 11, 1981, he said:

> The only means to satisfy a Canadian sense of legitimacy and credibility, and to remove the temptation from Britain to define the Canadian federal system or interpret the Canadian Constitution, is to have the legal meaning of the package resolved, finally, by the Supreme Court of Canada. In that one move, legitimacy would be determined, credibility achieved and relations with Britain would return to normal by Britain's acceptance of whatever the Supreme Court rules. The package, charter, amending formula and all, would thus be rescued from a demeaning debate that engulfs the nation and threatens its sometimes fragile unity.

Honourable senators, I felt so strongly about this need for the Supreme Court to give legitimacy to the resolution, that I had intended—and I have it in my hand here—to move a motion that I will read to you. It is as follows:

> That this Order be discharged and that the subject matter of the motion for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada or any matter relating thereto be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for examination and consideration, and that the committee report thereon no later than six months from the date of the adoption of this motion.

I am not going to move that motion, because I feel I should give myself the opportunity of hearing from other senators. I am not convinced that there is a need for haste. I am convinced that there is a need for consensus and legitimacy with regard to this resolution, and I beg some honourable senator, and I look forward to his doing so, to convince me accordingly.

[Senator Thompson.]

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I do not intend to take a great deal of your time tonight. I will speak for a short time and then ask leave to adjourn the debate and conclude my remarks tomorrow. I felt, however, that I wanted to go on record and make a few comments this evening, after listening to the excellent speeches of Senator Macdonald and Senator Thompson, particularly that of Senator Thompson which, though I am unable to agree with it, was a speech that was fully researched. Furthermore, I am sure that I speak for every one of us when I say that I recognize the sincerity of the views held and put forward by Senator Thompson. I am sure his speech represents his deeply held convictions on this vital question of the constitutional resolution.

I must say, however, honourable senators, that I honestly believe that in his effort to remind us—and he has reminded us—of the long and tortuous efforts by Canadians for over half a century to establish our own Constitution totally within our own power and our own jurisdiction, he has made a strong case for doing little or nothing, or, on the other hand, for proceeding with the utmost caution, almost to the point where there is an abrogation of the powers given to the House of Commons through an election, and to us through appointment, as the Parliament of Canada, by handing that responsibility over to an appointed body in the form of the Supreme Court of Canada. For my part, I say that that would be dereliction of our duty.

Senator Flynn: You are confusing the argument.

Senator Steuart: He has made the case for this generation of Canadians to do exactly what every generation of Canadians has done for the past half century when faced with the difficult task of bringing the Constitution to Canada, and developing a practical formula of amendment, as any mature, developed nation surely would want to do—that is to say, that we should follow the example of those who have gone before us and do little or nothing.

We are all aware of the tremendous efforts made by Canadian statesmen of all political parties to bring the Constitution home, and have an amending formula. They all failed, and they failed in the final analysis, I think, because they did not have either the conviction or the courage to proceed in the face of tremendous odds.

Frankly, I think that the time has come when we need the kind of statesman that we have now.

Senator Flynn: Like you?

Senator Steuart: I refer, of course, to the Prime Minister we have today, who has the courage to grasp the nettle, to take a stand and cut through the red tape and the fog of discontent and disunity that has hindered a solution to this question for over half a century, in order at last to do what he thinks is right, and to take what I think history will say was the right course to take.

Senator Thompson posed a question that bothers him, and that bothers a great many Canadians. He asks if we should do this in the face of all odds, or if we should try to please everybody, and thus risk pleasing nobody. Until we get total agreement, should we cower back and get no agreement? That is the path that has been followed too often in this nation. If, on the other hand, we follow the lead of our present Prime Minister, we will cease to follow those who have gone before us, and do what is right.

Senator Thompson poses another very serious question which is: Does the end justify the means? I am sure that has troubled all of us. Well, honourable senators, I say that in some cases, of course, the end justifies the means.

Senator Flynn: Oh, no!

Senator Steuart: Oh? In no case does the end ever justify the means? Well, honourable senators, I am afraid I disagree. I think there are many cases where the end justifies the means. It depends on the end, and on the goal, and, of course, it depends on the means.

An Hon. Senator: Did you ever hear of Christianity?

Senator Steuart: Let us look at the end we have in mind today. The end is a modern Constitution in Canada, amendable in Canada by Canadians. The end is a Charter of Rights to protect the basic rights and freedoms of all Canadians, regardless of their race, colour or creed, regardless of their station in life, regardless of where they live in this great nation. This charter is designed to protect, as never before, certain old rights and freedoms, but as well, some new rights and freedoms, such as rights for our natives, the original inhabitants of this nation. These are rights, I point out to you, that have never been protected before by provincial legislation or federal legislation, and I tell you that those native people are looking at a new concept and a new opportunity, as are the disabled people and many other minorities in the nation, as a result of the entrenching of a basic Charter of Rights in the Constitution, if we have the courage, as Canadians, to bring this about.

Senator Asselin: No more clause 44!

Senator Steuart: This is worthy of great effort and great sacrifice. I would point out to honourable senators opposite that it is also worthy of all enlightened Canadians.

Senator Asselin: No more clause 44!

Senator Steuart: What about the means? We are now engaged in dealing with the means. The passage of this resolution through the Senate, representing every region in Canada, and its passage through the House of Commons, composed of 284 men and women freely elected a year ago—

Senator Flynn: With no free vote!

Senator Steuart: —with a mandate, I point out, to govern—

Senator Flynn: With no free vote!

Senator Steuart: —with, I would point out, a fresh, strong mandate to govern—

Senator Flynn: With no free vote!

Senator Steuart: —and sent here from every part of Canada with full power to change, to rewrite and to amend this constitutional proposal, as they have already done, and as I am sure they will continue to do. If the Leader of the Opposition says that they will not do it, I ask him only to speak for his party because our party members have already shown, on this side of the house, that they have the courage to speak up when they dissent—witness two senators, one on the left and one on the right. If that is not true on the other side of the house, that is their problem, and that is why they are on that side of the house, I would suggest.

• (2230)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Steuart: This will pass eventually; it will pass or be defeated by a Parliament exercising its full power and its free will. If the members opposite say "nay," they show their contempt for the elected members of the other house and for the appointed people in this place, and I do not have that contempt.

Senator Flynn: You have no mandate—

Senator Steuart: I have a great deal more confidence than they obviously have.

Senator Flynn: You have no mandate to do that.

Senator Steuart: Again, I say that this is a worthy and honourable goal, but it does call for courage and it calls for unity, something that the honourable senators opposite obviously do not recognize, as witness recent events.

Senator Flynn: You have not read clause 44, then. You did not have that courage three months ago.

Senator Steuart: I am not sure if that was a question, an outburst, or a knee-jerk reaction—a reminder of their late difficulties. However, if it is I would withdraw; I do not want to get the honourable senator too upset.

However, what we are engaged in, honourable senators, is the building of a new Constitution, a new framework to help us build a stronger and, I point out, a more united Canada. That is what I think we will accomplish.

Honourable senators, I shall have more to say tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Steuart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 8 p.m.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

REPORT ON THE SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-54
"AN ACT TO AMEND THE STATUTE LAW RELATING TO INCOME TAX"

February 24, 1981

On February 4, 1981, Bill C-54, intituled "An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax", was passed by the House of Commons. This bill is intended to implement the Ways and Means Motion tabled by the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, Minister of Finance on January 12, 1981, which in turn reflects some of the measures proposed by the Ways and Means Motion tabled by the Honourable John C. Crosbie, Minister of Finance, on December 11, 1979 and the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, Minister of Finance, on April 21, 1980 and October 28, 1980.

By resolution of the Senate on February 5, 1981, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce was authorized to examine and consider the subject matter of the bill.

In accordance with the Order of Reference, your committee has given careful consideration to the Bill C-54 and in connection with such consideration has engaged the services of Mr. Charles Albert Poissant and Mr. Helmut Birk of Thorne Riddell, Chartered Accountants, Montreal, and retained as its counsel, Mr. Thomas S. Gillespie of Ogilvy, Renault, Montreal. The committee has heard from Messrs. R. A. Short, General Director, and T. Morris, Assistant Director, Tax Policy, Department of Finance, and Messrs. R. M. King, Director, Current Amendments Division, Legislation Branch, and Mr. W. A. Stoneham, Assistant Director, Accounting and Collection Division, Policy and Systems Branch, Department of National Revenue. It has also considered and discussed with the foregoing officials an opinion addressed to The Canadian Bankers' Association from Mr. John H. C. Clarry of McCarthy & McCarthy, Toronto respecting some difficulties presented by proposed amendments to the garnishment provisions of the Income Tax Act.

Bill C-54 contains many amendments to the Income Tax Act and the Income Tax Application Rules, 1971, as well as amendments to the Old Age Security Act, Canada Pension Plan, The Federal-Provincial Arrangements and Established Programs Financing Act, 1977, and The Federal-Provincial Fiscal Revision Act, 1964. There is no central theme to the amendments; some are beneficial to taxpayers, some are restrictive and some correct deficiencies and anomalies.

Taxpayers have had the advantage of considering the draft bill which was published in August 1980. Representations have been made to officials of the Department of Finance by interested parties and, as a result, many improvements have been made. The publication of a draft bill in advance has proved to be most useful and your committee hopes this practice will continue.

Your committee is pleased to note that the bill reflects some changes recommended by it in 1976 and 1979.

Many technical amendments respecting measures introduced relating to income bonds and term preferred shares were recommended by the committee in its report dated December 5, 1979. The Honourable John C. Crosbie, then Minister of Finance, came before your committee and undertook to amend the Income Tax Act to reflect some of the committee's recommendations. These undertakings have been incorporated in the bill except the undertaking given with respect to the phrase "acquired in the ordinary course of the business". The committee has been advised that officials of the Department of Finance are presently drafting regulations which will reflect the undertaking given. The regulations will be discussed with the committee's advisers prior to their publication. The minister also undertook to introduce further amendments should it become apparent that the act was not administered in the manner intended and indicated by him when he came before the committee. In its report dated December 8, 1976, your committee objected to the use of social insurance numbers to assist in the collection of income tax:

> Clause 75 provides that resident individuals must insert their Social Insurance Numbers on ownership certificates which must be completed when receiving interest or dividend payments in respect of bearer coupons or warrants. Should such an individual not provide his Social Insurance Number, the bank or paying agent would be obliged to withhold 25% of the interest or dividend payment. Your Committee feels this would constitute an improper use of taxpayers' Social Insurance Numbers and taxpayers should only be obliged to provide their proper names and addresses.

The committee is pleased to note that the bill proposes (clause 106) that ownership certificates need no longer contain a social insurance number.

The following is a brief resumé of some of the more important measures of the bill.

OVERSEAS EMPLOYMENT EXEMPTION (Subclause 2(2))

Bill C-54 contains an exemption for up to $50,000 in respect of remuneration paid by a Canadian employer to an employee who is employed on overseas contracts for a period exceeding six consecutive months. This exemption is intended to render Canadian firms more competitive in the international market scene. The exemption is introduced as a deduction from employment income of the employee and presumably must first be included in computing income from employment and reported by the employer and is subject to regular deductions at source. This would require the employee to claim the exemption in his tax return which, in effect, would mean that he receives his refund more than twelve months after the deduction. He would also not be entitled to any interest on the excess deduction.

In the opinion of your committee, a requirement for deductions at source would defeat the purpose of the relieving provision and it is therefore recommended that no deductions at source be required in such cases where there is reasonable evidence that the employee qualifies for the exemption. Furthermore, in the view of the committee, relief from deductions at source should commence at the time when the employee undertakes the overseas assignment and the employer provides a guarantee that the employee so qualifies for the exemption.

The committee has been advised by representatives of the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue that under the existing provisions of subsection 153(1.1) of the act dealing with "undue hardship", it would be possible to consider relief from deductions at source upon application by the employer and that this will be the policy of the department.

SUPPLIES INVENTORY AND PREPAID EXPENSES (Clauses 3 and 9)

Bill C-54 contains amendments to section 10 of the act (clause 3) dealing with the valuation of inventory of a taxpayer and section 18 (subclause 9(3)) dealing with prepaid expenses of a taxpayer. These amendments are considered in concert since they are interrelated.

The amendment in clause 3 has the effect of requiring a taxpayer to include in inventory for tax purposes items which formerly were considered a normal business expense in the year incurred. The new provisions stipulate that property of a taxpayer that is advertising or packaging material, parts or supplies, is to be considered inventory of the taxpayer and must be included in computing income of the taxpayer under the act. For the purpose of computing the amount of such inventory, the value thereof cannot be less than the lesser of cost and replacement cost.

Formerly, the position of the Department of National Revenue, as stated in Interpretation Bulletin IT-417 dated June 14, 1978 dealing with prepaid expenses, was as follows:

> Normally the cost of material, such as calendars, catalogues, maps, etc, used solely for advertising purposes should be deducted as a business expense in the year when the cost is incurred, but a practice of deferring the write-off for such costs to the year when the material is used is acceptable.

Regarding supplies inventory Interpretation Bulletin IT-51R, paragraph 3, states the position of the Department of National Revenue as follows:

> In certain instances particular supplies could have a nil market value as is the case when no one other than the taxpayer can use them. An example would be stationary supplies and forms bearing the printed name of the taxpayer. In such case, a taxpayer has a choice of either including these supplies in its inventory or claiming their cost as a deduction in computing income for the year in which the costs are incurred, provided that the method selected is consistently applied from year to year.

The committee is concerned that this change in policy, if strictly applied by the Department of National Revenue, will require a large number of corporate taxpayers and small unincorporated businesses to maintain inventory records for minor office supplies and advertising and packaging material on hand at the end of a fiscal period. The committee has received assurance from the witnesses appearing before the committee from the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue that the amendment in Bill C-54 does not represent a fundamental change in determining what is inventory. However, heretofore significant quantities and values of supplies, packaging material and advertising material on hand, although included in inventory, were shown to have no market value and could therefore be written off in the year acquired. Bill C-54 requires that such supply inventory be valued at not less than cost or replacement cost. These officials have given testimony that this new provision will not be applied indiscriminately but rather in the context of generally accepted accounting principles and that it is not the intention of the amendment nor will it be the policy of the Department of National Revenue to go beyond what are generally accepted accounting principles regarding items normally included in inventory. The Department of National Revenue will only insist that such items be included in the valuation of inventory where the amounts are significant in relation to the business as a whole. The Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue intend to monitor the effect of this amendment and its application on the taxpayer.

The committee is in agreement that the cost of significant supply items be claimed as an expense in the year in which they are consumed or become obsolete. However, the committee is concerned that the amendments to the law could lead to unnecessary recording of inventory for a large number of taxpayers if the amendments are strictly applied. It is therefore recommended that the Department of National Revenue amend Interpretation Bulletins IT-417 and IT-51R and restate its policy in this respect.

UNREGISTERED EMPLOYEE BENEFIT PLANS (Clause 4)

The Income Tax Act provides tax incentives to employers and employees to contribute to employee pension and deferred compensation plans. However, to be eligible, contributions must be made to registered plans. These plans are subject to certain restrictions on the type of investments allowed and on the amount of contribution that can be made and deducted from income in any year. Recently, there have emerged unregistered plans which provide substantial tax deferment to participants while, at the same time, contravening all the limits and restrictions imposed on registered plans. These unregistered plans can be structured so as to allow an employer an unlimited current tax deduction and to permit his employees an unlimited deferral of tax on income.

While there is some justification for allowing employers' deductions for contributions to certain unregistered plans (for example, for pension plans operated for employees of foreign branches of a Canadian employer), unregistered plans generally involve a significant loss of tax revenue and are unfair to other taxpayers who comply with the strict rules for registered plans. The amendments in Bill C-54 (clause 4) remove the unintended tax advantage arising out of certain unregistered employee benefit plans. Payments after December 11, 1979, by an employer to an unregistered plan will not be deductible until the time the amounts vest irrevocably in the employee. At that time, they will be taxable income to the employee. Special provisions are made to accommodate the needs of foreign branches of Canadian employers.

SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BONDS (Clause 8)

The concept of a small business development bond has been proposed to reduce the costs incurred by small business corporations while interest rates are high. This temporary measure is designed to reduce the interest cost to qualifying small business corporations by enabling them to obtain after-tax financing.

Clause 8 proposes that amounts received on account of interest shall be deemed to be dividends free of tax if received by a corporation in respect of a small business development bond. Conversely, the interest paid will not be deductible by the borrower. Small business development bonds are defined to mean debt obligations issued after December 11, 1979 and before January 1, 1982. (It was originally proposed that small business development bonds had to be issued before January 1, 1981. This expiry date was extended to April 1, 1981 and subsequently extended to January 1, 1982 by amendment introduced on second reading of Bill C-54 before the House of Commons.) They must have a principal amount of not less than $10,000 and not more than $500,000, and a term of not less than one year and not more than five years.

To qualify, the borrower and lender must make a joint election and the borrower must be a Canadian-controlled private corporation qualifying for the small business deduction. Substantially all its assets must be used in active business in Canada.

The borrower must either be in financial difficulty or the proceeds must be used to acquire land, certain depreciable property or to finance expenditures in respect of scientific research in Canada, provided the property acquired, if any, is used primarily in carrying on an active business in Canada.

LEASE OPTION ARRANGEMENTS (Subclause 5(2))

Agreements for the lease of property often include an option to acquire the property at the end of the lease. Sometimes the option price is considerably less than the fair market value at the time the option is exercised. It is therefore difficult to determine whether the rental payments made by the lessee are rental payments or payments on account of the purchase price of the asset and therefore capital payments.

The distinction has tax implications when property acquired upon exercise of an option is subsequently sold by the former lessee. If the arrangement were structured as a lease, but in substance it was a sale, the lessee could deduct the cost of a capital asset by deducting the rental payments and then dispose of the asset without recapture of capital cost.

A number of instances have culminated in determination by the administrative tribunals and the Courts. Reference is made to the judgment of the Tax Review Board in Chibougamau Lumber Ltée v. M.N.R. 73 DTC 134, and a decision of the Federal Court of Canada, Trial Division, in Lageaux & Frères, Inc. v. M.N.R. 74 DTC 6569.

On July 14, 1975, the Department of National Revenue issued Interpretation Bulletin IT-233 which reflected its views as well as the conclusions reached by the Tax Review Board and the Federal Court. In this bulletin the Department of National Revenue has suggested that a transaction may be considered to be a sale rather than a lease where:

(a) The lessee automatically acquires title at the end of the lease or after payment of a specified amount in the form of rentals (a full payout financial lease).

(b) The lessee is required to buy the property from the lessor during or at the termination of the lease (a "put" by the lessor or a mandatory purchase option) or the lessee is required to guarantee that the lessor will receive that full option price from the lessee or a third party (except where such a guarantee is given only in respect of excessive wear and tear inflicted by the lessee).

(c) The lessee is entitled to acquire the property during or at the expiration of the lease at an option price 'which at the inception of the lease is substantially less than the probable fair market value of the property at the time of permitted acquisition by the lessee'.

(d) The lessee has the right during or at the expiration of the lease to acquire the property at a price or under terms or conditions which at the inception of the lease is/are such that no reasonable person would fail to exercise the said option.

Subclause 5(2) of the bill addresses itself to the perceived abuse which may arise should a lessee acquire property for an amount less than its fair market value. It provides that where a taxpayer acquires depreciable property or land and before the time of acquisition the taxpayer is entitled to deduct rental payments and the cost of the property is less than its fair market value, the taxpayer is deemed to have acquired the property at a cost equal to the lesser of fair market value and the sum of the purchase price and rent previously paid for the property. The amount by which such deemed cost exceeds the purchase price will be deemed to be depreciation previously allowed the taxpayer in respect of the property. Where the property acquired is land, it is deemed to be depreciable property of a prescribed class. The net result is that if the former lessee were to sell the property at fair market value at the termination of the lease, he would be subject to recapture of depreciation and subject to tax on the full amount of recapture rather than having realized a capital gain and being taxed on one-half the amount.

The committee notes, however, that there may be an element of the retroactivity in this measure inasmuch as the proposed amendments will affect lease option transactions entered into before December 11, 1979, the date the measures were first introduced by a Ways and Means Motion.

CAPITAL GAINS STRIPS (Clause 24)

Schemes have been devised to avoid capital gains by structuring transactions in such a manner as to substitute tax-free intercorporate dividends for capital gains that would otherwise have been realized. The scope of the present anti-avoidance provision of the act (section 55) is questionable.

It is the government's view that a capital gain should arise on arm's length dispositions of shares at least to the extent that proceeds of disposition exceed income earned or realized after 1971. Any income or gain realized prior to 1972 would be reflected in the adjusted cost base of the shares of the corporation.

To this end, clause 24 proposes that subsection 55(2) be added to the act. It will provide that where a corporation resident in Canada receives a taxable dividend after April 21, 1980, free of tax, the dividend will not be considered to be a dividend but will give rise to capital gains consequences if the following conditions are met:

(1) the dividend was part of a transaction or series of transactions, one of the purposes or one of the results of which was to effect a significant reduction in the portion of the capital gain that would have been realized on the disposition at fair market value of any share.

(2) the dividend could reasonably be attributable to anything other than income earned or realized by any corporation after 1971 and before the dividend was received; and

(3) the dividend was received as part of a transaction that resulted in a disposition to an arm's length person.

Officials from the Department of Finance have clarified several technical questions which have arisen from the text of this Clause and these clarifications will be found in the printed proceedings of the Committee.

INCOME FROM CANADIAN RESOURCE PROPERTIES OF NON-RESIDENTS (Clause 62)

Formerly, it was technically possible that certain non-residents (e.g., residents of the United States) who owned a resource property in Canada and carried on a business here could sell such property and escape Canadian tax thereon. This was achieved by disposing of the resource property and retaining an overriding royalty interest therein. In a subsequent year and at a time when the non-resident did not have a permanent establishment in Canada, he would sell the royalty interest and would normally have been taxable on the proceeds thereof under Section 115 of the Act dealing with the income of non-residents. However, due to the provisions of the tax treaty with the United States, the non-resident was not subject to tax in Canada since he did not maintain a permanent establishment in this country to which could be attributed the income from the disposition of the disposition of the royalty interest. Furthermore, the disposition of the royalty interest was considered as capital property under the treaty, the gain from which was exempt under the existing Canada-U.S. treaty.

This situation will be rectified by Article VI of the new tax treaty signed by Canada and the United States of America. However, independent of the coming into force of this treaty, the present amendment to the Income Tax Act (subclause 63(3)) has the effect of subjecting the non-resident to full Canadian tax at the time that he ceases to operate a business in Canada.

A further amendment to section 116 (clause 63) has the effect of requiring the non-resident to pay his Canadian tax prior to disposition of the resource property. Should he fail to do so, the purchaser thereof will become liable for a tax of 50% on the gain from the disposition of the property by the non-resident.

GARNISHMENT (Clause 103)

Section 224 of the Act allows the Minister of National Revenue to take garnishment proceedings where he has knowledge or suspects that a person is or is about to become indebted or liable to make payment to a tax debtor.

In order to enable the minister to collect income taxes where tax debtors make arrangements with financial institutions which may make it difficult for him to collect taxes if the debtor were to become bankrupt, it is proposed that subsection 224(1.1) be added to the act.

It would stipulate that where the minister has knowledge or suspects that certain financial institutions are about to advance monies to or on behalf of tax debtors who are indebted to the institutions and who have granted security to the institutions in respect of the indebtedness, the minister may require the institutions to pay the monies to the Receiver General for Canada on account of the tax debtor's liability.

Council to The Canadian Bankers Association has suggested that the provisions of the proposed subsection are unclear in providing for the banks' rights and resources should the banks comply with the minister's requirement. Officials of the Department of National Revenue have undertaken to consider this matter further and officials of the Department of Finance have undertaken to introduce appropriate amendments to the act with retroactive effect should circumstances so warrant. Pending the introduction of any amendments, financial institutions may have to make contractual arrangements with tax debtor upon receipt of a minister's notification in order to protect their interests.

CONCLUSION

The Committee would like to express its appreciation for the services rendered by Messrs. Charles Albert Poissant, Helmut Birk and Thomas S. Gillespie.

The Committee has reviewed Bill C-54 in accordance with its terms of reference and, except as noted above, has no comment to make on the bill.

Respectfully submitted,

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

RECOMBINANT DNA RESEARCH—REGULATION

(Reply to question asked by the Honourable Andrew Thompson on January 29, 1981; see page 1613:)

Dr. Louis Siminovitch represented the Medical Research Council at the Asilomar Conference in February 1975 at which a moratorium on recombinant DNA research until Guidelines were in place was proposed. Council then asked Dr. Siminovitch to chair an ad hoc committee (including a lawyer) to develop Guidelines for MRC supported investigators. A first draft was distributed widely for comment in the summer of 1976 and the Guidelines were adopted by Council in February 1977. There is no evidence of any recombinant DNA research in Canada prior to the publication of the Guidelines. The Guidelines have formed the base of heightened awareness of biological hazards in research laboratories, and have prompted Universities to establish Biohazards Committees, many of which have assumed a mandate beyond the limits of the MRC Guidelines.

With respect to recombinant DNA, MRC Guidelines reflected similar documents in Britain and the United States. However, the MRC Guidelines went further than those of other countries in defining safety standards for work with animal viruses and animal cells in culture.

In essence, the purpose of the Guidelines is to set conditions under which the various types of recombinant DNA experiments can be performed safely with respect to investigators and the public. The potential hazards of the research can be reduced by varying degrees of physical and biological containment; physical containment involves equipment, air handling and lab design to minimize the escape of organisms and biological containment focusses on using organisms which, if they do escape, will not survive outside their laboratory growth media.

On publication, the MRC Guidelines were adopted by other federal agencies (for example, NRC and Health and Welfare), and by provincial and voluntary agencies. They remain the only Guidelines for recombinant DNA published in Canada, though other earlier documents (e.g. from the Treasury Board) have dealt with viral and microbial hazards. Copies of the Guidelines have been freely available to all.

The Medical Research Council, the National Cancer Institute and the National Research Council (before creation of the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council), which are the major sources of funds for research using the new methods, held special competitions in 1977 to provide equipment required to come into compliance with the Guidelines.

Shortly after the Guidelines were published, Council established the MRC Biohazards Committee to advise Council on the Guidelines, including revisions that might be necessary. This Committee has a majority of non-scientists (5), one of whom is Chairman, and four scientists. With the help of this Committee, Council has maintained close contact with those primarily responsible for implementing the Guidelines (the chairmen of University Biohazards Committees and biosafety technical personnel), and also with international developments in this rapidly evolving area (through a meeting with Dr. Jane Setlow, the Chairman of the American Recombinant DNA Advisory Committee, and participation in the European Science Foundation Liaison Committee on Recombinant DNA).

Acting on the advice of its Biohazards Committee, Council has twice made major revisions to its Guidelines on Recombinant DNA. These revisions reflect the rapidly changing perceptions of the risks of recombinant DNA research in the 4 years since the Guidelines were first published. The extent of change is illustrated by the fact that four years ago, for example, an experiment using human DNA in recombinant DNA research required very severe physical and biological containment but now is permitted on the open using common laboratory strains of bacteria. The current perceptions of risk are illustrated in the attached draft statement from the European Science Foundation Liaison Committee on Recombinant DNA. It is noteworthy that hardly any changes have been made in the virus and cell culture parts of the MRC Guidelines.

Council is satisfied that researchers in the field are following its Guidelines, and that the system of University Biohazards Committees established as a result of the Guidelines is working effectively to ensure the safety of workers and the public in the areas covered by the Recombinant DNA Guidelines.

There has been discussion in Canada on regulations or legislation around the technology of recombinant DNA. In June 1978, the Minister of Health and Welfare and the Minister of State for Science and Technology issued a joint press release stating their intention to promulgate regulations for research involving recombinant DNA. That statement was in accord with current trends in some other countries. Since that time, however, the rapidly diminishing perceptions of the risks of the technique have stopped the pressure for legislative control over the techniques, and Canadian regulations are unlikely.

DRAFT OF A STATEMENT FROM THE ESF LIAISON COMMITTEE ON RECOMBINANT DNA RESEARCH

The ESF Liaison Committee on Recombinant DNA, at its meeting on 14-15th January, 1981, unanimously decided that its work of promoting the necessary harmonization of national recombinant DNA guidelines is now sufficiently complete for the Liaison Committee to be disbanded. Although the national guidelines of some countries are still evolving towards the position already reached by others, the Committee believes that there is no further need for formal and regular liaison at the ESF between representatives of national recombinant DNA committees.

Extensive information supports the view that recombinant DNA work per se entails no significant novel biohazards. This is already accepted by some national recombinant DNA committees and in those countries special safety precautions beyond good microbiological practise together with the use of appropriate host organisms are no longer required for recombinant DNA work except when known pathogens or toxin producing organisms are involved. It has been established that recombinant DNA techniques offer safer ways of studying and using pathogens and for the production and study of toxins than conventional methods. The Liaison Committee endorses these national decisions.

In several countries microorganisms produced by recombinant DNA methods are now being grown on an industrial scale. Although some concern has been expressed about the biosafety of these large scale operations, the Liaison Committee points out that the fermentation industry already has long and extensive experience of large scale fermentation, including that of known natural and dangerous pathogens. Consistent with its statements in the proceeding paragraph the Committee emphasises that the large scale fermentation of microorganisms produced by recombinant DNA methods does not pose novel or special problems.

Finally, the Liaison Commission reaffirms its opinion that there is no scientific justification whatsoever for new legislation specific for recombinant DNA research and moreover, it sees no justification for further extensive recombinant DNA risk assessment programmes.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, March 3, 1981

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Honourable Renaude Lapointe, P.C., Speaker, pro tem, in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled:

Notice of Ways and Means Motion to amend the Petroleum Administration Act dated March 2, 1981.

Capital Budget of Petro-Canada for the financial year 1980, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with Order in Council P.C. 1979-3563, dated December 20, 1979, approving same.

Capital Budget of Petro-Canada for the financial year 1981, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with Order in Council P.C. 1980-3426, dated December 16, 1980, approving same.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

GASOLINE AND HOME HEATING OIL—PRICE INCREASES

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the minister who is responsible for economic development.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The minister in charge of economic development.

Senator Doody: Well, responsible for it.

Senator Flynn: I hope not.

Senator Doody: Be kind to the honourable gentleman; he has a difficult job. He does not have much help in that government.

Honourable senators, for two successive days now the government has tried to evade the truth of the accusation that the estimates provide for an increase in the spending of 13 per cent, which is substantially in excess of the campaign commitment made by the Liberal Party during the last election. It has been stated that it is still the ambition of the government to stay within the confines of the increase in the gross national product with regard to government spending. Obviously, it is way beyond that with this 13 per cent increase in spending.

Gasoline prices in Canada have escalated dramatically over the past few months. In Montreal the price of gasoline has increased by 40 cents per gallon and home heating oil by 39 cents per gallon in 11 months. Would the minister indicate that it is still government policy that energy price increases over the past year are to be less than those anticipated or promised by the previous government?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, my honourable friend knows that matters can change rather unexpectedly and dramatically.

Senator Doody: Including the government.

Senator Olson: When compared to what was promised by the previous government, it is still a great improvement. While it is perhaps not the entire reason, it is certainly part of the reason why there was a change in government on February 18, 1980.

Senator Asselin: Because you did not tell the truth to the people.

Senator Olson: If that is not enough, over this past weekend the Tory Party re-affirmed its position with respect to energy prices and stated that they ought to be increased to at least 75 per cent of the world price. I also understand that the party had a great deal of difficulty convincing itself that it should pull that increase down from 85 per cent to 75 per cent. The honourable senator knows very well that the problem we are facing now could not have been predicted prior to the last election campaign.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I thank the minister for his dissertation on the policies of the opposition and of the previous administration. I realize that he is quite flexible in his political affiliations, but I really did not ask him for explanations of the Tory approach to energy pricing. I was asking him to defend the promised increase, or lack of increase, of his own administration, and whether the policy of the government at the present time is to defend this increase of 40 cents a gallon in 11 months. How much more of an increase can we depend on in the next 11 months?

Senator Olson: I can give my honourable friend the assurance that it will be less than the 75 per cent level that his party is now advocating, which position was reaffirmed over the weekend.

Senator Flynn: You are speaking of your own policies.

Senator Olson: The reason I bring that up is that I am sure my honourable friend would not like to be in the untenable position of advocating lower energy prices, having come from his party's convention which advocated higher energy prices.

Senator Flynn: You were not there.

Senator Olson: That was the dilemma I saw my friend in, and I was trying to help him out of the situation.

Senator Flynn: Mind your own business.

Senator Doody: I certainly appreciate the honourable minister's offer of help but, if the kind of help he is offering is the kind of help he has been giving the Canadian public over the past 11 months, I regretfully refuse to accept it.

I would suggest to the honourable minister that perhaps the next definite commitment of a price increase we can expect from his administration will be slightly prior to the next general election. Would that be a fair assessment?

Senator Olson: My honourable friend can rest assured that this government intends to handle this energy situation, even though there may be unforeseen difficulties, in a highly responsible manner. If he were to add up all of the elements, including those that could not have been anticipated, then surely my honourable friend would agree that the totality of the increases, all other things being equal, would be substantially lower than prior to the situation of December 11, 1979.

Senator Doody: I would say, one final time, that it is not the lack of totality that worries me; it is the lack of specificity. If you are going to mutilate the Queen's English you should do it totally.

Senator Olson: I am sorry my honourable friend does not like the answers.

Senator Doody: There are no answers.

Senator Olson: I guess he does not like accuracy.

Senator Flynn: How dare you.

THE ECONOMY

GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT—GROWTH RATE

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I would direct my question to the Minister of State for Economic Development—or the minister in charge of it, as my colleague says.

Would the minister confirm whether, in the last quarter of 1980, the real growth in the Canadian gross national product was 2 per cent?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have seen a report to that effect, but I will check that information with the Department of Finance, if my honourable friend so desires. The report I have seen is directly attributed to Statistics Canada and, for the moment, I assume it is correct.

Senator Smith: Would the minister also confirm the figures from the same report that the real growth in the Canadian GNP for the whole of the year 1980 was only 0.1 per cent and was the worst economic performance since the 1954 recession?

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Olson: I believe I can confirm that but only on the same basis that I will check the details of that information. I think the explanation is rather obvious. There was a period during most of 1979 and up to February 18, 1980 when a different government was in office. Obviously, it takes a little time to catch up on that.

Senator Flynn: You are just a little joker.

Senator Olson: The growth in the fourth quarter, I think, was a pleasant surprise, even to those who tried to turn around the disastrous previous nine months.

Senator Smith: Does the honourable gentleman recognize that he is a little more inconsistent in his answers than usual, on the one hand claiming instantaneous revival because of the change of government and, on the other hand, saying there would be an instantaneous depreciation during the previous change of government?

Senator Olson: My honourable friend is completely misinterpreting me. I said that on March 3—the first day this government was in office—the improvement began.

Senator Flynn: He's speaking from both sides of his mouth as usual.

• (2010)

Senator Smith: I guess what the honourable gentleman is saying is that it took a year for the best efforts of his government to make any impression. It seems rather inconsistent of him to say it would take less than that for any effect to be made by the previous change in government, either good or bad.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend will have to look at those statistics a little more carefully because—

Senator Flynn: You, too.

Senator Olson: —certainly it took a few weeks or months for the economy to take the nose-dive it did when the previous government was in office, and, of course, the economy was going along rather well prior to that time, although there were some problems then and there are some problems now. If my honourable friend wants to get on a little more serious note—

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Olson: —the increase in the fourth quarter was surprisingly good and somewhat better than had been expected, which indicates a confidence in the Canadian economy—

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Olson: —that was not present before.

In addition to that, I would like to refer my honourable friend to the analysis made in the article he is looking at, and he will see that capital spending for the balance of 1981 and into 1982 is expected to go up by 16.6 per cent. What is more significant about that is that it is on a broad range of economic sectors. Therefore, it seems to me we have some right now to look at the future with even more confidence than we had.

Senator Smith: I am glad the honourable gentleman gave me an opportunity to remind him that the forecast advance of 16.6 per cent, which he just mentioned, was, in fact, expected to be led by an increase in housing investment which is expected to rise 12.2 per cent after falling 5.6 per cent. It is worthy to note as well that the forecast compares to an increase of 12.8 per cent in 1980, revised downwards from an earlier projection of 14.8 per cent.

Whether the honourable gentleman wishes to pretend it is upward or to accept the fact that it is downward, may I ask him what new plans he has, if any, for industrial development, particularly related to the improvement of the tragic situation which is now occurring in the west with respect to the national energy policy.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend obviously does not read well because he keeps coming back with these so-called lower than some expected increases. What the article deals with is the growth from one year to the next, and he should read that rather carefully, because it is very broadly based. In case he missed it, I could read some of those sections to him. It says:

> Capital spending in Canada is expected to rise 16.6 per cent to $76.3 billion this year from a year earlier—

That does not talk about expectations; it talks about what the facts were a year earlier.

Then it goes on to say that a great deal of this is going to be in the energy sector, but it also says:

> Metal and non-mining investment is expected to rise 36.7 per cent to $2.8 billion—

If he looks further down the article, my honourable friend will see that it says:

> —spending in the transportation, communications, and utilities group is forecast to rise 20.4 per cent to $2.7 billion.
> In other energy-related spending, investment in pipelines, especially natural gas lines, will rise 147.7 per cent to $839 million—

Still further down, it says:

> Among the leading manufacturing industries, chemical firms expect to spend $572 million, up 47.6 per cent; . . . transportation equipment $241 million, up 19.6 per cent.

The point of all this is that it is a very broadly based increase in capital investment for the balance of this year. The honourable senator is really not taking the context of that if he starts to look at some supposed expectation in energy, and suggests that that is down. In spite of its being down from some illusory expectations, it is still going up by over 20 per cent.

Senator Smith: Then I would expect, if any expectations I take from this report are illusory, any that the honourable gentleman takes from the report are equally illusory.

Senator Olson: No, it is a matter of interpretation.

Senator Smith: I do not take much comfort in his being any less illusory than mine.

Senator Olson: I do.

Senator Smith: At times one's reading gets a little selective, and I suppose mine did, but the honourable gentleman seems to be a little less comprehensive than he indicated, because I notice, according to the same article, that housing starts and automobile sales continued to be sluggish in January. On a seasonally-adjusted basis, housing starts posted only a minimum gain from 157,800 in December to 158,000 in January, far below the 178,000 starts in 1981 forecast by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and 21.9 per cent below the level of January 1980.

On a seasonally adjusted basis, motor vehicles actually dropped 2 per cent in January. So if one wants to be comprehensive, one had better be comprehensive in everything.

Senator Olson: I agree, but I think the honourable senator should have read one paragraph that he skipped over. For example, it says:

> Taken from the viewpoint of construction spending—

That is the one he was selectively talking about.

> —the agency expects a 16.3 per cent rise to $45.9 billion for new construction in 1981, led by growth [as he pointed out] in non-residential building.

Non-residential, of course, is going to go up by over 30 per cent. The honourable senator should not suggest that construction is going down when the interpretation of the article is exactly the opposite.

Senator Smith: I can see that it is not much use asking the honourable gentleman to be a realist, any more than it is in the national energy policy.

Senator Olson: That is subject to your interpretation.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS CONCERNING PROSTITUTION

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question which I suppose has survived many governments. I planned to ask it of the Leader of the Government, and perhaps I could leave it with the deputy leader. My question is directed specifically to the government leader, he being the minister from British Columbia, and deals with promised legislation on prostitute harassment specifically in the city of Vancouver.

The Minister of Justice, certainly since last summer, has been promising that something would be done. He has indicated that there are ongoing discussions with provincial attorneys general, pending court cases, and the like. Because the amendments to the Criminal Code do not deal with the matter, I was wondering whether the Leader of the Government could tell me when such Criminal Code amendments may be expected, and I now direct my question to the deputy leader.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice and will pass it on to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I have no briefing material on it here.

ENERGY

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF PETROFINA CANADA INC.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Minister of State for Economic Development whether the government has yet decided how it is going to raise the money for the purchase of Petrofina, and, in particular, whether the government has decided what will be the extent and timing of the Canadian ownership account tax for that purpose.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I believe I gave a commitment some days ago that as soon as that decision had been finalized and an announcement was ready to be made, I would bring it to this chamber as quickly as possible. Quite frankly, that time has not yet arrived. Moreover, I do not believe that there has been any final decision on the percentage of the $1.46 billion requirement—that is, how much equity to loan with respect to Petro-Canada. We know, of course, that the president has suggested that he would like to have the equity injection as high as possible to give him more room for other things, but the decision as to the amount has not been made.

Senator Murray: I take it, then, that the decision has not yet been reached by the government. We have a brief period in this chamber for delayed answers to questions. Perhaps we should have a period to deal with delayed decisions, of which that is only one of many.

INDUSTRY

INDUSTRIAL RESTRUCTURING AND MANPOWER RETRAINING PROGRAM

Hon. Lowell Murray: May I ask the minister whether the government has yet reached a decision as to which six communities in this country will benefit from the $350 million to be distributed for industrial readjustment and related purposes?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have said many times in this chamber that I am not going to make announcements for and on behalf of other ministers, but that I would get the information as quickly as is physically possible when the announcements are being made. I believe that decision falls into that category. I do not believe that the ministers directly responsible—namely, the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce—have reached the point where they are ready to make a public announcement about them.

● (2020)

Senator Murray: I take it, then, that the answer to that question is the same as the answer to the previous question, namely, that while a grand and eloquent announcement has been made by the government, no decision has been taken as to a program.

[Senator Frith.]

I may say, in passing, that while the Minister of Manpower and Immigration—I believe it is—and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce may be responsible, if the Minister of State for Economic Development does not have an important co-ordinating role in a program involving several of the economic departments touching on the long awaited industrial strategy, I find this incomprehensible; but, in any case, the decision on that has not been made either.

Will the minister, however, say whether the government has reached a decision on the amount that is to be paid to the prairie grain farmers in respect of the period when a grain embargo was in force against the Soviet Union?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator knows what my response is going to be before he asks questions like these. The inference that he draws is that the government has not made a decision. He can make that point if he wants to, though he does not have licence to infer that the minister does not have any part in reaching those decisions. He does have to accept, however, even though it may take a long time for me to get the point through to him, that I am not going to make announcements before the ministers directly responsible for the programs do. My policy in that regard has not changed since the first day I appeared in this chamber as a minister.

Senator Murray: I do not expect the minister to make announcements prior to their being made by his colleagues. I simply expect the minister to make announcements when decisions are made.

I asked him, in the case of three fairly major announcements made in the past by the government, whether the decisions had been made on the programs. The decisions obviously have not been made. That being the case, I feel impelled to ask him what is happening in the Government of Canada and the cabinet these days, besides discussions with the great theologian, Mr. Trudeau, as to how many angels can dance on the head of a constitutional pin.

Senator Steuart: Thirty-four per cent.

Senator Asselin: What about clause 44?

Senator Olson: My honourable friend is trying to abuse me with these questions, but I do not care how much he tries, or what angle he comes at it from, even if it is from 20 different angles; he is not going to get me to tell him what happens in cabinet.

Senator Murray: Nothing happens; that is very clear.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend is also showing a great deal of impatience as to when decisions are being made, and I understand why. My honourable friends opposite went through a period when they could not make any decisions either, and when they did make them they were the wrong ones because they did not have enough time. I understand a lot of the problems that my honourable friend has. However he tries, though, he is not going to get me to discuss what goes on in cabinet meetings, so he might as well stop trying.

Hon. G. I. Smith: The honourable gentleman may make all the threats he wants to make, but that will not stop us asking all the questions we want to ask, nor will it stop him showing that he does not know what is going on, in any event. After all, there is nothing wrong with asking whether or not the cabinet has made a decision.

Senator Olson: Nothing whatever. That is what I am saying. If he had asked whether the cabinet had made a decision, I would have given him a brief, polite answer; but he did not do that. He prefaced his remarks by saying, "Obviously, the minister does not know what is going on."

Senator Smith: The only person the honourable minister is doing any harm to is himself. If he would stop for a moment, and realize what he sounds like to everybody who listens to him and reads what he says, he will understand that it is not to his personal advantage to make these extraordinary pronouncements about what he will and will not do. He will find that we are just as persevering as he is.

Senator Olson: I am sorry, honourable senators, but I thought that with a little repetition of what I have said before, we might be able to use the Question Period a little more productively, that is all.

Senator Smith: I am sure that a sensible answer, once in a while, would greatly improve the quality of the Question Period.

Senator Olson: The house leader says, "Try some questions for once."

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

BALTIC HONORARY CONSULS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I am pleased to bring to your attention the presence of three distinguished visitors in the gallery. They are: Dr. Jonas Zmuidzinas, Acting Honorary Consul General of Lithuania; Mr. Ilmar Heinsoo, Honorary Consul of Estonia; and Dr. Edward Upenieks, Honorary Consul of Latvia for Ontario. I am sure that all honourable senators would wish to join with me in extending to them a warm welcome to our capital city. We wish them a very interesting, educational and enjoyable visit to our capital and to Parliament. We are looking forward to meeting them in person at the Ninth Baltic Evening to be held tomorrow in the Confederation Room.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to join with Senator Haidasz in welcoming our distinguished visitors, but in doing so I would express the hope that our guests will not judge the Senate by the replies we get from the government.

Senator Olson: Nor by the intelligence of the questions.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO CHRYSLER CORPORATION—AMENDED AND RESTATED LOAN INSURANCE AGREEMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have one delayed answer in response to a question raised on February 24 by Senator Balfour concerning the government's assistance to the Chrysler Corporation.

I must inform the honourable senator that the amount of penalty that Chrysler would have to pay for not meeting its annual production-to-sales ratio requirement under the auto pact is a matter of confidential customs information between the Department of National Revenue and Chrysler. Furthermore, the government is optimistic, and we hope that with the aid of our loan guarantees Chrysler will once again be a successful corporate citizen, to the extent that they will be able in future years to make up current deficiencies.

For the terms of the agreement the government has made with Chrysler, I would refer the honourable senator to the statement I made about two weeks ago, which was made previous to that by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, which I tabled in this house.

NEWFOUNDLAND

SEAL HUNT PROTEST ACTIVITIES—DELAYED ANSWER—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on February 24, 1981, concerning the seal hunt.

Of the three environmental groups involved in the protest of the seal hunt, two have not been granted permits. Those two groups are: the Greenpeace group led by Paul Watson, who has been ordered out of the Atlantic provinces; and the Rainbow Warrior group from Amsterdam. The third group, the International Fund for Animal Welfare, led by Brian Davies, has been granted only two permits—one for a Dr. Weiss, a veterinarian, and the other for their pilot. These people are being kept under surveillance by the RCMP and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, while I appreciate the answer, I have to raise a question of privilege. On February 24, as the deputy leader has said, I raised the question with regard to the seal hunt. In light of the scientific evidence of the danger to the seal pup of the dye which is threatened to be used by that ignoramus, Paul Watson, I suggested and recommended that certain action be taken by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Indeed, last evening I asked, on delayed answers, whether the Leader of the Government had an answer for me, and he indicated that he did not.

It is evident to most honourable senators that last night, on the 11 o'clock news, my question was answered through the press when the purported conservationist, Paul Watson, was apprehended by the RCMP and told not to enter the seal hunt area through P.E.I. or any other way.

• (2030)

My question is: Why do we have a Question Period here? One week ago, on February 24, I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate a legitimate question concerning Newfoundland and the seal hunt activities there. I was concerned with what action the government would take to prevent certain supposed conservationists from spraying the seals with dye. I was quite confident in my own mind that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans would take the action that I recommended, but when we met last night the Leader of the Government in the Senate had no answer to my question. Surely, there must be something wrong with the system if, in one week's time, the leader here could not find the answer that I knew was there.

It is obvious, honourable senators, that there is something wrong with the system of producing answers to questions asked during Question Period. I am beginning to wonder if we should be sitting in the reading room watching the television to find out what is happening in the House of Commons; or perhaps we should bring the television set into the chamber and watch the Commons here; or perhaps we should ask questions of and receive answers from those who represent the government in the other place.

Another bone of contention with me concerns the questions that appear on the order paper. Surely, when I pose a question on June 17 in one year it deserves to be answered before March of the following year, but there it is: I asked a question on June 17 last year, and I have not yet received an answer. I asked another question on October 7, 1980, and it has not been answered either. It causes me to wonder whether we should have a Question Period at all, or why we should be allowed to put questions on the order paper. Honourable senators, there must be a better way.

Just the other day a representative of Canadian Press called me to ask what I thought about the Question Period in the Senate. You know, I actually tried to protect the Leader of the Government in the Senate by saying that we receive answers in one or two days, and receive better answers than they do in the other place.

Senator Asselin: That is not the case.

Senator Marshall: Indeed, I was naive. In my opinion, the total matter should be referred to the appropriate committee in this place to determine whether we should have a Question Period at all; whether we are entitled to receive answers to legitimate questions; whether we should be treated in a manner appropriate to representatives of parts of Canada who are entitled to ask questions in order to elicit information which will meet the interests of the people they are expected to serve.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, before I comment on Senator Marshall's remarks, I would ask one question for clarification. Is Senator Marshall suggesting that he already knew the answer to the question he asked on February 24, and deliberately asked that question to determine how long it would take to receive an answer? I am not suggesting he should or should not have done that; I am just asking if he is telling us that he knew what the answer was before asking his question.

Senator Marshall: No.

[Senator Marshall.]

Senator Frith: I thought he had said he knew what the answer was when he asked the question.

Senator Marshall: No, I was simply confident that the action the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans would take was the action I suggested. I had that confidence because, in previous years when I was a member of the other place, I and a member of the government suggested amending the Fisheries Act in order to give the government and the Fisheries officials the power to stop the activities of people like Watson and Davies, who, in my opinion, are non-Canadians.

All I am saying now is that, based on my confidence in the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, I presumed he would follow a certain course of action, and, in fact, he did so, using the authority he has under the Fisheries Act. I am not saying I knew the answer; I knew what the answer should be, but, unfortunately, until I received that answer from the Leader of the Government I could not tell the people in Newfoundland what I fully expected to be able to tell them, namely, that the people who are executing the seal hunt in Newfoundland would have the protection of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. I could not get that answer here, but it was available because I saw it on the TV news last night after the Leader of the Government had told me he did not yet have the answer.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, in the first place, the truth is that the Leader of the Government did not have the answer; if he did have it, he would have given it.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Will the deputy leader permit me to comment on the first part of his answer?

Senator Frith: Do you wish to comment on whether the leader had the answer or not?

Senator Asselin: Yes.

Senator Frith: Certainly.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: If I may make a comment about this question of privilege, I would say that the Deputy Leader of the Government seems to be surprised by the fact that even if I know the answer, I would still ask the question.

Senator Frith: No.

Senator Asselin: Even if I know the answer, I am entitled to ask the question because the information that I am seeking is not only for myself; it is for the public, and it is also for my colleagues who might not know the answer. He should therefore not be surprised if I still ask the question even though I might know how the minister will answer. This is not quite what the Deputy Leader of the Government would want. He would like me not to ask the question if I already know the answer. However, I am not here only to get information for myself, but also for my colleagues and the public, and this is why we ask questions.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Asselin has simply misunderstood the comments that I made. We can discuss the matter, and I imagine that we shall come to an agreement, because if he examines what I said, he will find that I put a question to him. I did not say that he was wrong. In fact, I did not say that this was necessarily right or wrong, but for my own information, I wanted to know whether I was to understand that Senator Marshall already knew the answer when he asked his question. I was not surprised. I simply wanted to understand the true reason for his intervention. If someone wants to ask questions when he already has the answer, perhaps to obtain clarification or further information from the government, this is quite acceptable. Indeed, why not?

Senator Asselin: To inform the public.

Senator Frith: Why not? I am not surprised; I simply wanted to understand the position of Senator Marshall.

[English]

With respect to the general matter of furnishing answers to questions, it is the wish of the present government, as I know it was the wish of the previous government, not only to furnish information but to supply it as promptly as possible. With respect, honourable senators, I do not think the performance of this government is any better or any worse than the performance of the previous government in that regard. I know that they tried their best. I remember asking many questions and I usually received the answers quite quickly, but there were cases in which the members of the former government also had difficulty in obtaining answers from their officials.

I believe there is always room for improvement, and it is perfectly in order for members of the opposition to draw attention, as Senator Marshall has tonight, to questions that remain unanswered for long periods of time. If there is a question that has been on the order paper since last June, surely that should be drawn to the attention of the government and to the attention of the Senate. But, with respect, I do not feel that the performance of the government has been so bad that there is a need to bring into question the whole idea of the Question Period. Rather, I support the reply given by Senator Marshall to the Canadian Press, that at least in some cases the questions that he had put had been given prompt and adequate attention.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators—

Senator Asselin: Here comes clause 44!

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, if Senator Asselin can just get a grip on himself, I will deal with clause 44.

Senator Asselin: I hope so.

Senator Steuart: However, if he keeps on with his present performance, I may move an amendment to put the clause back in.

Senator Flynn: If you do, I will support it, I can assure you. I promise you I will support it.

Senator Steuart: If I were as close to retirement as you are, I would support it, too.

Senator Flynn: To judge by looks, you will be out of here in no time.

Senator Frith: They are off and running!

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, as I enter this debate, I do so with a great deal of pride. We are actually making history here. We are breaking new ground in an attempt—which I believe will be successful—to bring our Constitution to Canada; to have, after all these years, an amending formula which is practical and which will work; and to see at least the beginnings of the entrenchment of a comprehensive Bill of Rights.

• (2040)

I take a great deal of pride in this process. I would like to congratulate the members of the Joint Committee on the Constitution; they did an excellent job. I join with others in congratulating the joint chairmen, Mr. Serge Joyal and Senator Hays. They are a credit to Parliament, and they deserve the congratulations they have received, from every part of Canada. It is interesting to note that over half the senators took some part in the deliberations of the committee. I was pleased to be allowed to play a small part in its deliberations. As a result of that intervention, I took more interest in the committee proceedings and, of course, learned a great deal.

Although the initiative did not come from this side of the house, it was an excellent idea to put television in that committee in order to bring its proceedings to the public. The committee heard all kinds of briefs representing the views of hundreds of thousands of Canadians. It listened and then debated and amended that package. It accepted amendments from the Conservatives, the NDP and the public in general, and as a result it is a far better and more comprehensive package. As a result of thousands of Canadians being able to watch on television the committee at work, a great educational process took place. A vast quantity of knowledge was amassed as to what this country is all about and with regard to the hopes and aspirations of the disadvantaged and minority groups in every part of the country. Although all the groups did not win their points, they were at least heard. Those who did not succeed have at least laid the groundwork for when the Constitution is patriated and there is in place a practical, sensible and workable amending formula.

Members of the Senate and others who served on that committee, particularly those who were full-time members, did themselves proud. From this side of the house, Senator Austin made a great contribution. When naming individuals, inevitably somebody is missed, but I can think of names like Bob Bockstael, Jake Epp, Senator Roblin, Senator Tremblay, Svend Robinson, Lorne Nystrom and many others. In fact, within a relatively short period of time the names of these people almost became household words across Canada. This can only help the image of the House of Commons, the Senate, the democratic process and Parliament. These people did an excellent job, and it is too bad that the spirit which prevailed in that committee was not carried through and that it ended in political partisanship which resulted in the final report not receiving the full endorsement of the committee. However, the work of the committee stands as a monument to the democratic process and to the serious work completed by members on both sides of this chamber and members of the other place.

When I spoke during the debate on whether to send this resolution to committee, I expressed some concerns about the needs of Saskatchewan. Along with other members of this chamber from Saskatchewan, I expressed concerns about the problem of indirect taxation which has plagued and threatened Saskatchewan for a long time and which at one point threatened to cost the people of that province up to half a billion dollars. I expressed the concerns of the people of that province with regard to the ownership of their resources—the feeling of the people of the province of Saskatchewan, as enunciated by my government and the NDP government of the province over the past few years, about the control and sale of its resources across Canada and outside the boundaries of this nation. In this regard, I am sure that we were reflecting concerns held by other provinces and by other regions. I expressed concern about the referendum process with regard to the position taken by the federal government and, to some extent, by the government of the province of Saskatchewan. I expressed concern about clause 44, the so-called "Senate reform clause," and I questioned the entire proposition of entrenching a charter of rights in the Constitution, because it would be a tremendous departure from what we have had in the past.

Like a great many other people across this country, in this chamber and in this Parliament, I still have some questions about whether the entrenchment of rights is in fact the best way to protect the rights and the freedoms of all Canadians. However, I must say that I had most of my questions answered in a positive way, whether it was through watching the proceedings, taking part in the proceedings or reading the results of the proceedings.

Senator Flynn: We suspected that.

Senator Steuart: I believe that hundreds of thousands of Canadians also felt that by the time this committee reported, most of their questions on the Constitution itself, the amending formula and the Charter of Rights had been answered.

Senator Asselin: The polls do not show that.

Senator Steuart: I will not answer that.

First, I would like to deal with the question of so-called "Senate reform" as envisioned in clause 70 and clause 44. The inclusion of those clauses may have been with the intention that Senate reform would take place at some time in the future. Personally, I feel that these clauses could well have been a time-bomb. While many would look upon the dissolution of, or doing away with, the Senate through Senate reform as a positive change, it is not how I look at the situation. I was happy to see clause 44 deleted.

Although I believe in Senate reform, I am convinced that the Senate is doing good work—though I am equally convinced that the Senate could do much better work. I feel that we in this Senate and we in this Parliament have initiated and will continue to initiate Senate reform. I believe that when the time comes and we sit down as the Senate and the Parliament of Canada, we will initiate better Senate reform than anything which has been suggested so far by the provinces or the regions. Fellow senators, if we do not bring in Senate reform soon, then I believe that we deserve the criticism and the condemnation which we have received. However, I am confident that we can initiate the spirit of reform and that we will bring about reform.

I also supported most of the positions put forward by Premier Blakeney on behalf of Saskatchewan.

For a moment I would like to review the results obtained by members from all sides who worked on the committee and through the amendments put forward by the NDP. Many of the amendments accepted by the joint committee will prove of great benefit in the future, not only to the province of Saskatchewan but to all of the provinces.

The concern we felt for the ownership of our resources has been laid to rest. Our concern over the control of the development of our resources has been laid to rest. As a result of our concern for the sale of our resources across Canada, we wanted changes and we were granted those changes. As a result of our concern, not to mention the conflict both inside and outside Saskatchewan over the years, with regard to indirect taxation on resources, we were granted that right. While we in Saskatchewan wanted control over the sale of our resources outside Canada, Premier Blakeney lost this right because of his actions or perhaps because of his lack of action.

I believe we received part of what we wanted with regard to the referendum clause—which was some control for the provinces. We wanted the right for the provinces to be able to initiate a referendum in certain cases. While we did not receive the right to initiate a referendum, we were given certain controls within the process. In that case, Premier Blakeney got half a loaf, but in most other programs he put forward he, in fact, got everything he asked for. There is no question in my mind that the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Jean Chrétien, offered to meet the bottom line of Premier Blakeney and Attorney General Roy Romanow for their support. He has made no apologies for that, and I make no apologies for that. We want support for this very important package from that side of the house; we want support from every Canadian; and we don't apologize for that. We are proud because we are convinced that we are engaged in something which would be better if we had support from every quarter. However, I am afraid we will not get that support.

• (2050)

Senator Murray: It would be legitimate if you had.

Senator Roblin: You are right.

Senator Steuart: Senator Roblin says, "You are right." As an ex-premier, he should know the impossibility of ever getting unanimous support from the premiers for almost anything, including the time of day.

Premier Blakeney had an opportunity to get what he wanted for Saskatchewan, and he blew it because he put politics ahead of principle. As an excuse, he used the fact that clause 44 had been taken out of the package, and that the Senate had been given more power. I am sure he knew he was wrong. He was either confused himself or was attempting to confuse others.

Honourable senators, even on the question of human rights, the Premier of Saskatchewan played petty politics—just as many senators on that side of the house are playing petty politics.

Senator Flynn: You would never do that; you are so pure!

Senator Steuart: Let me just tell you a short history of the fight for human rights in the province of Saskatchewan. About 25 years ago Tommy Douglas, the leader of the CCF government, brought in a Bill of Rights—one of the first to be brought in by any province in this country. The CCF, under Tommy Douglas, and later the NDP, under Woodrow Lloyd, fought for the entrenchment of a Charter of Rights in the Constitution of Canada. Until this last year or two, Premier Blakeney was a member of those political parties, and he never raised his voice. I am convinced and confident that he supported that position. But he changed, and I am afraid that his convictions did not change; his politics changed.

Senator Flynn: What about you?

Senator Steuart: What about me? You will get your chance to make a speech. When I say something that I wanted, at least I had the courage of my convictions. I am prepared to back this Constitution. I have watched the Tories day after day say, "If you only put this in, or that in, we will support it." We put "this" in and "that" in, and they never supported it.

Senator Flynn: Never.

Senator Steuart: The truth is, they will not support this because it starts with the Liberal government and Pierre Trudeau. That is the truth, and they are afraid to face it.

I am afraid that Premier Blakeney lost his reputation and some of his mantle as a Canadian statesman, and I think that is a shame. As most of the premiers did, he ended up bargaining the human rights and freedoms of the people for the ability to sell fish or oil. I think that is a shame and that the people of Saskatchewan are the losers.

Senator Asselin: He was not for sale.

Senator Steuart: I too had doubts about the question of rights. I am as aware as anyone else in this chamber of the fact that the United States of America has a very strong Constitution, with a great many rights entrenched in it, and I am as aware as anyone else that, from time to time, those rights, especially of minorities, have not been upheld in spite of the Constitution. I am as aware as anyone else that they probably have the finest Bill of Rights in the U.S.S.R., yet they have no rights; and that in Great Britain, where they do not have a great many rights written down, they probably have more rights and freedoms than any other country in the world.

I read the briefs, I watched the people, and I came to the conclusion that a great many people—I am willing to say the majority of people—in this country want an entrenched Bill of Rights.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Steuart: I watched those people come before the committee representing the disadvantaged and the minorities, and they asked for rights. Sometimes they asked for rights they already had, but they wanted to see them entrenched because they said they would feel safer and more confident. I became convinced that if that was what was necessary to give these people that kind of confidence in this country, then, in spite of the troubles we may have—and I think we will have some troubles—it was worth it.

On top of that, I want to point out that in the proposed Charter of Rights we are not just protecting rights and freedoms that already exist; we are adding some new rights. I will deal, specifically, with rights relative to our native peoples. For the first time in the history of Canada we have recognized, and will recognize, if this constitutional package passes, aboriginal rights.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Steuart: Heretofore aboriginal rights have not been recognized. Even the treaty rights of our Indian people have not been maintained and lived up to from time to time. This has been a fight of our Indian people; it has been a fight of the Metis; and it has been a fight of the Inuit for years to get a succession of federal governments to, first, make strong statements, and then embed in legislation, and now in a Constitution, the fact that we recognize aboriginal rights. They have got that.

Senator Murray: May I ask a question?

Senator Steuart: Yes.

Senator Murray: I should like to know whether the aboriginal rights of which the honourable senator speaks will be able to be changed without the consent of those people by the federal government and the provinces.

Senator Steuart: Bide your time; I will deal with that right now. I have had delegations come to see me, as I presume is the case with other honourable senators. I am as aware as, or perhaps even more aware than, the honourable senator that over the years the Indian people in this nation have signed treaties with the Queen, with the Crown, and then with Canada in the name of the Crown. They have never had to deal with the provinces. Their treaty rights were with the federal government and, by and large, they have not wanted to deal with the provinces. Some provinces, in their treatment of native peoples, have been outstandingly good; unfortunately, some provinces have been outstandingly bad. Therefore, the native peoples, and especially the Indian people, want some guarantee, when it comes to dealing with their treaties and aboriginal rights, that without their permission these rights cannot be handed over, by agreement between the provinces and the federal government, to the jurisdiction of the provinces.

That poses difficulties. The largest question that comes to my mind is: Who speaks for the Indian people? That is a problem they are wrestling with right now. I hope they are able to solve it, and I hope that right now some amendments are being considered. I am confident that they are. I hope some way can be found to give this guarantee to the native peoples. If it is not found in the Constitution at this stage, then I hope that when the Constitution is patriated we shall have an amending formula in place so that, if they do not win two-thirds or four-fifths of their fight today, they will continue to press, to push and to fight. I hope it will not fall on deaf ears. I hope they get what they want, but I realize it is extremely difficult.

Senator Tremblay: I have a question about clause 35(2), which deals with aboriginal rights. I understand from that clause that the aboriginal peoples will be invited to a federal-provincial conference, the purpose of which would be "the identification and definition of the rights of those people to be included in the Constitution". I should like to have your understanding of that clause in terms of any gain to the aboriginal peoples.

Senator Steuart: I understand your question. I am not a constitutional lawyer, but I am confident that the intention of the amendments brought in at the committee hearings were, in fact, to put aboriginal rights in the Constitution. The question of clarifying what those rights are and the question of whether they will, in fact, be given a veto over something that happens in the future, is still open for debate and consideration.

Let me tell Senator Tremblay that I have been dealing with the native peoples for a long time, and if he wants to split hairs—and he loves to split hairs—I tell him that the native peoples, by and large, and especially the Metis and the Inuit peoples, are delighted that, at long last, they are beginning to get recognition of their aboriginal and treaty rights. I say that it is a step forward, and if he does not think it is, let him deal with the native peoples.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

● (2100)

Senator Steuart: If you don't mind, Senator Tremblay, perhaps you would make your intervention later on. In the meantime, I will finish my speech.

I tell Senator Tremblay and I tell you, honourable senators, that I have met as many, if not more, native people in the last six months or six years than I am sure he has.

Senator Olson: More.

Senator Steuart: I can tell him that all the leaders of the native people I met say this was a good step, and they want more like it. I hope they get more. But it was a giant step forward. He can shake his head all he wants. If he does not recognize that, then I am afraid there is not much hope that he will recognize much else.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Senator Steuart.]

Senator Steuart: When this charter comes back here—obviously, it will not come back here by any will, hope or vision from the other side of the house—and it is the law of this country, it will, honourable senators, give new hope and new opportunity to minorities and disadvantaged people from one end of this country to the other. It gives the lie to statements that, in fact, it will spread disharmony and disunity. It will, in fact, in spite of the best or worst efforts of some honourable senators opposite, and others, bring the people of this country closer together and make this country more unified.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Steuart: The minority people—

Senator Flynn: If you say so.

Senator Steuart: —of this country, especially the native peoples and the handicapped, must be disappointed by the lack of action of the Tories. Let me tell you they must be extremely disappointed by the lack of action by some members of the NDP—and I emphasize "some".

Senator Asselin: Are you speaking on behalf of the handicapped people?

Senator Steuart: Some of the NDP in Saskatchewan have talked for years, fought for years, and given lip service for years to the rights of the minorities, the little people and the disadvantaged. When the time came to put up or shut up—to put their money where their mouths are and stand up and be counted—I am afraid they again put petty politics ahead of their principles and they backed off.

They said what you people said for years about rights and about worrying about minorities. That was either a fake, or you have lost your nerve, or you are putting politics first. You cannot have it both ways.

Honourable senators, that is what this debate is all about. It is an attempt to balance the good with the bad. It is an attempt to find out what is valuable, weigh it in the balance, and if you find that there is far more value, as I do, in this Constitution package than there are serious questions, then support it. That is our job.

You know, it is interesting to note that as you go around this country and talk to members of Parliament from all sides of the house, people outside these chambers, and people anywhere in the country, you cannot find anyone who does not want the Constitution in Canada.

Senator Flynn: Of course.

Senator Steuart: They all want the Constitution in Canada—even the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: You are beside the point.

Senator Steuart: He has finally made an intervention I can understand. He said "Of course" very clearly. Thank you very much. Everyone wants the Constitution in Canada.

Senator Flynn: Sure.

Senator Steuart: Tell me who will stand up and say they do not want a practical amending formula in Canada—

Senator Flynn: Sure.

Senator Steuart: A formula for amendment by Canadians. I say that is practical, and wonderful work.

Senator Flynn: Sure.

Senator Steuart: Again, even with the Leader of the Opposition, we are making great headway. Two more "sures", and he is on our side.

Senator Flynn: Your mind is completely blocked.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, who can stand up and say they do not want the rights of the minorities protected? We are all for freedom of speech, freedom of religion and freedom of assembly. Who is against discrimination? Well, I think there are a lot of people who are against discrimination.

Senator Flynn: Who is against motherhood?

Senator Steuart: Sometimes when I look at the other side I have an odd question about motherhood.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Steuart: What do our opponents say when they cower in their seats, heckle and throw out gibes and are afraid to stand up and be counted when we are making history in this country. What do they say? They say, "We like what you are doing, but we don't like the way you are doing it."

Senator Flynn: That is the point.

Senator Steuart: That has been the cry of the timid and the backward ever since we tackled this subject half a century ago. I give some of you and some of them credit for being against this on principle. I give some of the NDP the same credit, and I even give credit to some Liberals who are against it. However, again, they like the results, but they cannot stand the process.

Senator Macdonald, speaking for the Conservatives last night, had a whole list of things to mention, just as they all have had. He said, "Why do you not have God in the Constitution? Why do you have this and that in the Constitution?" The Prime Minister said—and I will say it—"If we put it in, will you support it?" Oh no, you will not support it. You won't support it, no matter what we put in or take out. Why don't you tell the truth? You are talking rubbish, and if you are honest, you will know it.

Senator Asselin: Your party voted against that in the committee.

Senator Steuart: No, no.

Senator Asselin: Yes, they did. I was there.

Senator Steuart: No, no.

Senator Asselin: I was there. Oh, yes.

Senator Perrault: The Conservative premiers voted against it.

Senator Steuart: The only party that votes against things that happen to their own party is on that side of the house, not on this side of the house.

Senator Asselin: Look at the minutes.

Senator Steuart: If you do not like the method, I challenge you then. Give us a better method. Give us an alternative. Give us one that will work. That is the key word.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Steuart: Yesterday evening Senator Thompson described in great detail how every Prime Minister—King, Bennett, St. Laurent, Diefenbaker—tried to bring the Constitution home with an amending formula, and failed. They failed, but they made great efforts. Prime Minister Trudeau tried and he tried and he tried. He tried harder than anyone else, and again he failed. But he did not quit. That was the difference between him and the others. He didn't quit. He persevered. He didn't quit and he won't quit. That is the difference.

I tell you a good part of the opposition that comes from the Tories is not due to any distaste they have for the method; it is because they can't stand the idea that this man won't quit and he is going to succeed. They are more concerned about his success than they are about the procedure.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Adoration!

Senator Steuart: There are some opponents, particularly some of the premiers, who are opposed to this for no other reason than politics. Let us take a look at them. Bennett is in trouble. Lougheed wouldn't be in trouble if he let them count the votes with the lights out for five hours all by themselves. He is not in trouble. Blakeney thinks he is in trouble, but I don't think he is—I wish he was. Sterling Lyon is in trouble.

Senator Roblin: Don't count him out yet.

Senator Steuart: What is the formula in Canada if you are in trouble politically in the provinces? The formula is to bash the federal government.

Senator Flynn: That's what you did.

Senator Doody: Bash the Brits.

Senator Steuart: Don't worry about the unity of the nation. Don't worry about what is good for the country. Just get a real battle going with Ottawa. It is really interesting. I notice in the Globe and Mail the headline "Hees splits with Clark." I will read from an article in the Globe and Mail of this morning:

> —a second Conservative MP dramatically broke with Mr. Clark's constitutional position by stating the matter should be settled by a free vote—

I would be interested to see if they have a free vote. Mr. Hees said, "We don't have to give a free vote; our members always vote their conscience."

Senator Tremblay: You don't need freedom, but discipline.

Senator Steuart: Just listen to what Mr. Hees said:

> "I've given up completely on the provinces," veteran Tory MP George Hees said in an interview after a short statement in the House. "They're just horse-traders for oil and fish. The people of Canada are represented perfectly in this Parliament. This is where it all comes together."
>
> Conservative backbencher William Yurko (Edmonton East) has already announced he plans to break with his party and support the constitutional resolution now before Parliament.

I tell you the Tories better end this Constitution debate quickly, or we will have them all on our side.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith: So far you are down a few.

Senator Steuart: There is even one Tory out in Alberta that came on our side. What a courageous man. He should get the Canada Medal. "Of course," he said, "I am for it one day," and two seconds later they booted him out. That is how democracy works in Tory Alberta. However, it was refreshing. We can now claim we have got representation even out of Alberta.

Senator Tremblay: We want a free vote.

Senator Steuart: I do not say the provincial governments do not have that right or responsibility to speak for their provinces. But, unfortunately, taking on the federal government, bashing the federal government, in season and out, has lately become a Canadian sickness, and I think it's a national disgrace.

• (2110)

Senator Smith: It's the other way around.

Senator Steuart: I will tell you something: The proposed Constitution that is now before us is aimed at unifying the country; but, unfortunately, not all of the proponents but far too many of them, especially in western Canada, are using this to spread disunity.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame.

Senator Steuart: I don't point the finger at anyone, but they are guilty and they are out in western Canada. This Constitution is not aimed at one part of Canada or another; it is not aimed at one section or one set of individuals—

Senator Flynn: It is aimed at Quebec.

Senator Steuart: If the honourable senator does not like the Constitution, if he is against it, of course, that is his privilege; but I do not think it is your privilege, at least as a good Canadian, to say that this is another something brought up by the Liberal government to spread disunity. That, in fact, is not true. This Constitution is the fairest and most equitable formula that has yet been devised, and if honourable senators opposite know a better one, a fairer and more equitable one, even at this late hour, let them bring it forward. Look at the premiers—the gang of six.

An Hon. Senator: It is eight now; read the newspapers.

[Senator Steuart.]

Senator Steuart: No, no, not unless they announced it at 6 o'clock. The last word I had from my friend Allan Blakeney was that they were still wavering. If there are eight, then there are eight without him. He isn't in it, let me tell you frankly. Whether it's the gang of six or the gang of eight, it is still just as tacky and as seedy. Every time I think of them getting down there and cavorting with the Premier of Quebec, a man dedicated to tearing this country apart—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Steuart: —I wonder what kind of Canadians they are. I say this—

Senator Flynn: What about Mr. Ryan and the Union Nationale? All the parties in Quebec are opposed.

Senator Steuart: You don't see him cavorting with the premiers. They would just put him out of office. He may disagree with the package—

Senator Flynn: He disagrees entirely.

Senator Steuart: What about Prime Minister Trudeau? All the Liberals got elected there. They won the last election. The last election in Quebec was a federal election.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Steuart: I say that Prime Minister Trudeau speaks for Quebec.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: You never sought a mandate in the last election.

Senator Steuart: I tell you—

Senator Flynn: You never sought a mandate in the last election.

Senator Steuart: I am saying that I tell you—

Some Hon. Senators: Order, order.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: When a senator rises—

Some Hon. Senators: Order, order.

Senator Flynn: I said your party never sought a mandate in the last election.

Senator Riley: Resume your seat.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I am aware that the Premier of Quebec takes a stand against the Constitution—

Senator Tremblay: May I ask a question?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Steuart: Not at this moment. Let me finish first.

Senator Tremblay: Have you observed—

Senator Steuart: Try to contain yourself for a moment. If you wait until I have finished, I will gladly answer your question.

Now, there may be someone who speaks for Quebec, but I tell you there is no question about who does not speak for Quebec, and that is the Tories.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: Who speaks for western Canada?

Senator Steuart: If the premiers have a better idea, a better way than that put forward, why don't they come up with it? They say, "Come back to the table". They cannot even agree among themselves when they are over here, knowing that it is going to go to London, trying desperately to stop it, going to this court and that court. Why don't they come up with a better plan? Because they couldn't agree even on a death-bed repentance—and you know it, if you are honest. They have not had a new idea about the Constitution of this country. They are bankrupt of new ideas, and that's a fact. We are engaged in building this country—

Senator Flynn: Everyone is wrong but you.

Senator Steuart: —we are engaged in moulding the future of this country; we are engaged in laying out a new framework to make a greater, better and a more unified Canada. You people are missing the opportunity to take part. I tell you that history will say that you did the wrong thing—and if you are honest, you will admit it. You are not part of the solution; you are a great deal of the problem.

All of us wish—there is not anyone who does not wish that we could develop this constitutional package with unanimity. Of course, we wish that. All of us wish that all the questions of all Canadians were answered. I will tell you something: I am convinced that most Canadians support the proposed constitutional package now and will continue to support it, and that support will grow just as it did for the flag and for medicare. Every time the Liberal government has broken new ground, the Tories have run into their shells and said, "No, no, it won't work; it will split the country; it's terrible, it's a disaster; it's the end of the world"; and five years later they are getting up and waving the flag, or they are saying, "Well, really we weren't against medicare, and really we weren't against old age pensions." You have been on the wrong side of every issue since Confederation almost.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Steuart: History will prove that what we are doing is sound; history will judge that what we are doing is right. I say this is the time for courage, for positive thinking—

Senator Flynn: You did not invent medicare.

Senator Steuart: I intend to support it, and I urge every member of this chamber to do the same.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Will the honourable senator permit a question? Did he indicate that he is going to move an amendment with regard to human rights?

Senator Steuart: I said that the way you were acting I was almost going to move an amendment to bring back clause 44; but you have cleaned up your act a little at the end.

Senator Asselin: Go ahead.

Senator Flynn: That would dampen the enthusiasm of your colleagues, who very much like noise in order to—

Senator Tremblay: May I ask a question? I think I had permission from the honourable senator a moment ago to ask one or two questions. My first is a question of fact.

Senator Smith: He won't know any.

Senator Tremblay: Indeed, they are both questions of fact. Did the honourable senator say in his speech that the provinces can take the initiative of the referendum provided for in clause 46—

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Senator Tremblay: I think the honourable senator said that.

Senator Asselin: He said "yes" during his speech.

Senator Steuart: I may have lapsed into Irish, and so the honourable senator may have misunderstood me. I didn't say it, but I will check the text. I am sure I didn't say it; but if I did say it, I didn't mean it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Steuart: But, anyway, I am right and you are wrong.

Senator Tremblay: I was not sure that I had understood the honourable senator correctly. However, the record will show what he said.

My second question is as follows: Is it a fact that the honourable senator received the loudest applause on his side when he attacked the legitimate Government of Quebec?

Senator Steuart: The answer is no, absolutely no. If you listen, I will tell you. I got the loudest applause from this side when I said I was not sure all the time who represented the people of Quebec; the one thing I was sure of was that you Tories didn't.

Senator Asselin: My good friend Senator Steuart seems to be very brave and courageous tonight. He made a fairly good speech. He said at the beginning that he was ready to put forward, to table, an amendment in order to bring back clause 44.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

• (2120)

Senator Asselin: You said that at the beginning of your speech. Are you ready to do it, if you are so brave and courageous?

Senator Steuart: I am very brave and very courageous, but I am not crazy. I just said that when I see the way senators like you behave I wonder sometimes if we should have taken it out, and think that perhaps we should put it back. No, I never suggested bringing it back; you may rest assured that I will not bring it back.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Will the honourable senator entertain one last question?

Senator Frith: Is that a promise?

Senator Nurgitz: Senator Steuart was very clear that the Tories were not speaking for Quebec. Could he tell us what Liberals speak for the province of Saskatchewan?

Senator Steuart: D. G. Steuart.

Senator Nurgitz: I trust, honourable senator, that you speak alone.

Senator Steuart: I did not say they agreed with me. I said I speak for them.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvette Rousseau: Honourable senators, due to circumstances, I have had the privilege of attending, as a more or less permanent member, many sittings of the Joint Committee on the Constitution. I shall not spend too much time dealing with the excellent work of this committee and the marvelous experience this was for me. I considered it my duty to become involved in its proceedings, for the same reason that I wanted to speak today. As is the case with my intervention today, my presence at the committee sittings was motivated by the conviction that I was serving the cause of the constitutional debate. I voluntarily limited myself to listening to what was being said. I considered this much better to ensure my own objectivity. I wanted to make sure first of all that the solution put forward to solve the constitutional problems of Canada was not only in agreement with my own deepest beliefs, but also to the advantage of Canadians. This objective having been reached, I set myself to the task of summarizing my views on the main points.

Before outlining them, honourable senators, I would like to pay tribute to the two co-chairmen of the committee, Honourable Senator Hays and Mr. Serge Joyal, for having done such a good job as the foremost representatives of the Senate and the House of Commons respectively. I also wish to congratulate all the Committee members and the participants for the high quality of their contributions. They have helped me better understand Canada and consolidate my own beliefs.

If I may, I would also like to draw your attention to the fact that, as a woman, I am somewhat at a disadvantage in this debate. Very few women have had the privilege of sitting in this house in the last 114 years. In fact, I am only the eighteenth woman to be appointed to the Senate and one of the nine to be able today to join with all of you for this historic debate. In short, few women have acquired much experience in Parliament, with respect to constitutional matters, of course. Moreover, previous to the positive contribution of women to the referendum campaign in Quebec and this constitutional debate, very few women have had the chance to voice their interest and express their views.

The submissions of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women and other women's groups have shown that women do have relevant opinions, that these organizations have a role to play in this type of debate and that they should be taken into account. Besides, subsequent developments at the Advisory Council even if they will require the restoration of its credibility and its ability to act and to provide leadership, have shown that women felt that they were in an unfavourable situation, that they wished to have their own forum and take an active part in the debate.

I appeal to you, of course, not as a former president of that council, but as a senator. Even in that capacity and in spite of my involvement in the Quebec referendum campaign and in the committee meetings, my approach to the constitutional debate is that of a greenhorn. I like to believe that my speech is primarily the personal testimony of a Canadian from Quebec expressing a vision of Canada essentially oriented towards the future and the solution to our constitutional dilemma. I want to state my views and to explain the consequence and meaning of my support.

I, for one, intend to support the resolution even if some arguments have led me to make some reservations on the applicability and constitutionality of some of the provisions. I therefore listened carefully to the arguments put forward by various groups, provincial representatives and members of the committee. I still feel that we should proceed with this exercise.

Basically, I think that the time has come for us to bring Canada's anachronistic constitutional situation to an end and that we should all join in the effort to provide Canada with its own Constitution. Our country's honour, that of its people and political institutions, especially on the federal level, are at stake.

Above all, this updating of our Constitution should provide us with the opportunity to rethink our federation and realize the urgency and necessity to find a new balance between a provincial neo-federalism and a centralist neo-federalism, in order to achieve our potential and meet the aspirations of our fellow Canadians, our ethnic groups, our nations and cultures.

I have found, on the basis of a number of polls, that a proportion of Canadians are not apparently in favour of unilateral action. When trying to interpret the results of these polls, we must keep in mind that their main purpose is to assess public opinion. They are very useful only as a means to take the pulse of the people and not as a means to know its will.

● (2130)

If we wanted to run a country on the basis of poll results, we would have to develop more adequate questionnaires. For the moment, since polls are not alternative to the democratic voting process, no one can be sure that a majority is opposing Parliament's move because many interviewed people only answered questions without considering alternatives, unlike voters when they have to make choices.

Nor am I surprised to see that some provinces and political parties are opposed to it. Obviously, in the shorter term, they are the ones benefitting from the situation. What they seem to object to the most is the unilateral procedure which they see as a distortion of a certain perception they have of our federal system. Carried to extremes, it would mean we have a system of ten principalities of a sort which could only be ruled by unanimous decisions.

I do not think it would be wise to view the present and future federal system of our country and of our democracy on the basis of absolute unanimity among the provinces. That notion would lead to a provincial neo-federalism which might be the everlasting source of stagnation of our system and quite possibly the dismemberment of our country.

In my opinion, that notion derives from an incomplete interpretation of the evolution of our system towards the quest for a consensus, and a tendentious appreciation of the implications of the principle of unanimity for the operation of our system.

It is important to assess the basis of the principle of unanimity, its necessity and its implications for Canada, among other things the possibility of seeing the country backing up deeper into a constitutional deadlock and progressing towards provincial federalism.

I leave it to those among you who have that historic knowledge of Canada and of its constitutional process to set the facts straight in the course of this debate. The people will be particularly interested to note that the process of constitutional evolution towards the need to achieve a federal-provincial consensus has reached today's extent only over the last 30 years, that is since our federal system has been increasingly oriented towards decentralization and enhanced economic opportunities for the provinces. For the time being, I will limit myself to my judgment on the current situation and especially on the federal balance sought for the future.

It is very likely that our federal system has been decentralized to such an extent that it is altogether tricky to maintain a balanced decentralization of the forces. In a system such as ours, the lack of progress and co-operation as well as the ever-diverging views on the priorities and the operation of the country are indications that we are at the limit of decentralization and that the sharing of powers has been too hazy for us to maintain a functional federalism.

The citizens must understand the stakes of the theses and the forces, both federal and provincial, to appreciate properly that the actualization project advocates a balanced solution aimed at preventing a severe dismemberment of the country.

Too many federal actions are invariably seen and qualified as interventions in fields of provincial jurisdiction, not to indicate the development of a new provincial federalism that could easily lead to that tearing apart. In addition, it seems to me that throughout the '50s and the '60s, more progress was accomplished than in the last decade in which there were more confrontations and an increase in political tensions. In short, the fact that the federal-provincial conferences accomplish less confirms that tendency.

In addition to making a realistic assessment of the implications for Parliament and the federation, let us also have a realistic picture of provincial forces and balances.

Canada is made up of ten provinces and one central government set up in a federal system which is certainly the best framework for governing a country. The federation would fare better if the provincial forces were more balanced, and the role of the central government would be that much simpler. You are aware of how tremendously different things are, as a result of the disparities between the provinces which have always required arrangements or interventions to allow our federation to function.

I cannot see, in the years to come, any elements that would lead me to believe that the relative balance between those forces will change. Quite the contrary: the imbalances will increase and the current push for provincial powers and decentralization will surely grow.

Even if a consensus was reached today, it could be so superficial and weak that the country would be at exactly the same point as without a consensus. The state of interprovincial relations, the balance of power among the provinces as well as their overall political make-up could make us seriously question their consensus and see it as a marriage of reason with political overtones. It would be difficult to assess the scope and basis of any provincial consensus.

At this time, we need more than a consensus, we need a strong desire to succeed for Canada. While assessing this proposal, let us consider realistically the federal political forces as well as those of our institutions. Honourable senators, you are well aware of the political events of the last 15 years and of their consequences.

Personally, I do not think that we can afford to wait, as we did in the past, that new forces capable of leading to a negotiated solution appear on the federal and provincial scene, because provincial neo-federalism is already in the making.

The options open to us and the time remaining are also limited, when we consider that the Parliament's privilege is confined to sending a resolution to another Parliament asking it to enact this proposal. Honourable senators, you are well aware of the extent of political authority and you realize that even if we decide to wait any longer, we will have to go through the same exercise over again. Parliament will always have to use its options and powers to their maximum allowable limit to put an end to a constitutional anachronism which tears away at unity and limits the action that our Canadian federation can take, because we do not have absolute control over its development. The Kershaw report makes that aspect of our constitutional situation perfectly clear. Although it is offensive, we must nonetheless find satisfaction in the fact that it was written, because it allows Canadians to look at themselves as in a mirror and to measure the limitations of their Parliament.

The possibility of seeing the resolution blocked would exacerbate the frustrations in some areas of the country because it would mean powerlessness and reinforce one of the causes of Quebec nationalism which stems partly from the ambiguity of our constitutional status. Despite the minority status of Quebecers in the country and a strong, lasting and undoubtedly irreversible nationalistic movement among them, a majority of them opted for Canada and the resulting ties under the Statute of Westminster. Let there be no mistake: that choice was far from a confirmation that they want to retain an ambiguous status and as deep a relationship as the majority of Canadians with the motherland. They want most of all a country to call their very own, a balanced federalism and control over their province.

Jean Lesage's brillant slogan "Masters in our own house" during the "quiet revolution" could mean here in Canada as well as here in Quebec, as indicated by the support of federalist forces to his cause in 1960 and, twenty years later, by the choice made through the referendum.

Furthermore, it was the implicit wish of many during the constitutional discussions held since 1949. Then, many people hoped it would be the last time Canada would have to go to London. Those expectations were disappointed. With the opportunity we now have, I do not think it would be advisable for Canadians, present and future, to leave only memories and hopes on the record. I have no doubt that the deceived hopes explain in part the strength of the nationalist movement in Quebec and the frustration felt in other regions, because they meant powerlessness and left political and sociological vacuums.

The situation will remain the same in Quebec and in other provinces, or even worse, if we fail to take action on the commitments made explicitly or implicitly during the Quebec referendum. It is worthwhile to remember during our debates the meaning of the referendum results.

The percentage of No votes included most of the anglophones and also a large segment of the Quebecers whose ethnic origin is other than French Canadian. So the No vote won by a slim majority. Our satisfaction since the night of the referendum should not make us forget that our margin of political action is not wide enough to allow any delay in renewing our Constitution.

It would have been preferable if the tremendous thrust of constitutional conferences had resulted in a consensus. They have only shown the deep differences of opinions about the future of our country and its institutions, and these were also held by other provinces than Quebec. The intentions were good but in retrospect, it seems that too much was expected from such conferences. It is now up to Parliament to act and to put the constitutional process on another track.

Some have suggested that this resolution be referred to the Supreme Court. I do not think this is a proper solution. I share the view that this constitutional change should not result from a judicial interpretation but rather from a political move.

A reference to the Supreme Court would add to our constitutional problem. I may be mistaken, but I understand that in 1867 at the time of the BNA Act, the Supreme Court of Canada did not exist. It was created by the federal Parliament in 1875, under section 101. Consequently the Supreme Court is a Canadian-made court over which our Parliament, theoretically at least, has jurisdiction. Since the Supreme Court does not yield its existence from the Constitution, it would be advisable, for the credibility of the resolution, of Parliament and the court itself, not to refer this constitutional change to it. It would be different if we had, as is the case in France, a constitutional court established by the constitution, with specified powers in this regard.

As to the Charter of Rights, I would have liked it to be even more detailed. This would only have been possible with the participation of the provinces. The Charter is a definite step in the right direction. However, it is easy to entertain reservations concerning language rights, because clause 23, while strenghtening considerably minority rights, might be the source of linguistic tensions and possible interference according to our distribution of powers. To guarantee the rights of minorities to education in their own language, I would have preferred two separate clauses, including one for Quebec, to better take into account different situations and jurisdictions.

Moreover, complete progress will be achieved only when Ontario does take action under section 133 to improve institutional bilingualism within the province. Indeed, it is not enough to offer bilingual services if the province as such refuses at the same time to legitimize bilingualism. It is more than desirable for Ontario to take part in the country's efforts to promote bilingualism as a step towards unity.

In the case of Quebec, many people consider section 23 as being a serious step backwards compared with the principles previously advocated. I do not believe this to be true. Our main concern must not be for minority rights, but for the way they are respected. This is why I hope that we shall be wise enough to respect provincial jurisdictions, especially where education is concerned. This is one risk for Quebec which could be neutralized.

Even though some people might question this, Quebecers should not think that the francophone character of their society would be changed by the new charter, because its evolution is irreversible and our modern society allows not only for assimilation, but also for effective promotion of the language. It will probably be necessary to set a new linguistic balance. If this is done wisely, it can be as profitable as the one which has prevailed in the last ten years and allow the French language in Quebec to enjoy its acquired maturity, even though the minorities will have also acquired specific rights. As other than linguistic factors have contributed to this evolution, it is doubtful that the new minority rights can effect a reversal of the present trend. It is up to the Quebecers to see to it.

The extent of the linguistic rights could have been different if the Quebec government and the main opposition party in the province had committed themselves, if they had explained their future policies concerning rights and languages and taken appropriate political action. In this way, they would have established that they had no other priorities and were not relying only on the intepretation of the courts. The efforts in the field of communication and politics were not necessarily adequate.

As to the third part of the proposed resolution, the amending formula, I entirely agree with it. Indeed, it is inconceivable that the Constitution could be brought back and put under Canada's control without an amending formula. Many people have questioned some aspects of the proposed formula. It is valid and functional even when we consider the problems arising from the use of the referendum and the use of the present formula in our parliamentary system.

My experience with political institutions and democratic process have always led me to believe that the only real source of power for parliament stems from the sovereignty of the people. The major enforcement mechanisms have always been representation by means of elections or direct consultation as with a referendum. Any amending formula based on direct consultation, recognizes the sovereignty of the citizenry. That is consistent with the democratic spirit of our country while it is a major change in our representation system and parliamentary decision-making process.

The amending formula will improve our federal system by granting a veto right to the provinces on a regional basis, by taking from the federal government the right to unilateral amendment and transferring it to the people, and by allowing any one of the two founding races to exist politically and, in the long term, by granting a veto right to the Province of Quebec.

I would hope that the provinces will come up with an amending formula that can produce a consensus, inter-provincially, capable of solving the basic problems. But even then, a referendum process will no doubt be required, because we must retain in our Constitution a means to ensure not only that deadlocks will be broken, but also that a balance will be reached between the legal and the political aspects and between the central government and the provinces.

Because there was no such mechanism, Canada took a long time to become a truly sovereign nation. This was a drawback, and the unification within a workable federalism has but partly been achieved. Future generations must be freed from the hindrance of rigid structures and insufficiently rapid change.

Fifty years ago, and even 25 years ago, we could afford to take the time needed to reach a consensus. Things are quite different now, and will be much more so in the forthcoming decades. We should not forget that under the technological and political forces at play in our society the process of change has accelerated tremendously, and clearly this is beyond our control.

We must therefore provide the nation with institutions that will allow for quick changes and evolution, if this country is not to be perceived as Voltaire perceived it. It is to accommodate the future rather than the past that we must change the decision-making process in our democracy, using a referendum procedure that leaves no doubt and gives citizens the supremacy over Parliament and other levels of government.

Let me conclude by being more specific about the need for adequate institutions in this country because it is not good enough, although it is essential, to have a mechanism for breaking deadlocks and for solving conflicts, both with respect to national and federal issues.

It is more and more likely that the realization of the opportunities and possibilities of this country will require some changes. Many political personalities at all levels will have different views or will support other theories. But if you think about the impact of tehnological developments, in the communications field for instance, you will better understand the need for considering some changes. In particular, it will surely be necessary to establish a more specific distribution of responsiblities, so as to prevent overlapping and to allow a more direct provincial participation in some national institutions, in order to better achieve a more functional federalism which was not possible through federal-provincial consultations and negotiations.

Priority will probably be given to matters concerning the Senate, provincial representation in the Supreme Court and the feasibility of representation by population. It would be rather speculative to try to imagine what the other issues should be, but people will realize without any difficulty that the actualization of the 1981 Constitution should only be one step. It will not be very difficult to figure out the character of the relations between the provincial governments and the courts, if their attempt falls through completely. It will be just as easy to enunciate the implications for those who want a balanced federalism, in the opposite case.

For these reasons, I am sure that many Canadians, and many Quebecers, do hope that this constitutional debate will allow for other changes.

I have no doubt that following this debate we will have given the future generations a permanent solution to our constitutional problem, and to the Canadians of today, the pride to say "Long live Canada" on the 1st of July, 1981, for they will then be in possession of the missing element that will give the word Canada the meaning of country. For the Quebeckers, these words could be as sweet as saying "Long live Quebec" and they will not be questioning their motto "Je me souviens".

THE SENATE

Wednesday, March 4, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Renaude Lapointe, P.C., Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

> Order in Council P.C. 1981-259, dated February 2, 1981, approving a supplementary Capital Budget permitting Petro-Canada to undertake or commit to share purchase investments to an amount of $1,500,000,000, including the undertaking of external financing commitments for that amount as required, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to comment on our future sittings, if I may have leave to do so.

On Monday it was our intention to sit five days this week—that is, on Monday and Tuesday evenings, on Wednesday and Thursday afternoons and on Friday morning. The plan for next week's sittings was the same.

I am speaking now, under Notices of Motions, because I had a motion prepared that calls for a sitting at 11 o'clock on Friday morning of this week. That is necessary because the rules require us to sit at 2 o'clock on Friday afternoon. I also had a motion prepared that would require the Senate to sit at 8 o'clock on Monday evening.

I wish to advise honourable senators that because we are discussing what might be an equally effective procedure, and perhaps a more measured pace, for our debate on the motion for an Address respecting the Constitution, we have not yet decided on the hours of next week's sittings. My honourable friends opposite have assured me that if they feel they are necessary they will give leave for such motions to be moved, but I can tell the house that the plan I have just mentioned is under active consideration. I know the importance of notice in the consideration of plane schedules and other travel plans, and I am sure we will have something to report about Friday and next week's sittings no later than approximately this time tomorrow.

QUESTION PERIOD

ENERGY

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—POSSIBLE IMPOSITION OF COUNTERVAILING DUTIES ON CANADIAN EXPORTS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. The Canadian Organization of Small Business said last month in a submission to the National Energy Board that in response to the national energy policy:

> Several countries, including the United States, are giving consideration to the use of countervailing duties against manufactured imports from Canada to offset what they regard as an artificial subsidy to Canadian energy consumers.

While the Secretary of State for External Affairs has acknowledged that the U.S.A. and the E.E.C. have both expressed serious reservations about our national energy policy, we have not previously been told of any prospect of countervailing duties being levied against Canada.

Would the minister inquire and inform the Senate as to whether Canada has received any prior indication to the effect that certain countries are considering levying countervailing duties against Canada because of the national energy policy?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, no, I have not, but I will check with the Department of External Affairs and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The Department of External Affairs is likely to be the first to know if any messages have been received. I will check into that and advise my honourable friend. I have, of course, read some of the press speculation, which has no official foundation in fact.

TRANSPORT

EAST COAST SHIPPING—DART CONTAINER LINE AND CP SHIPS

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. In recent days the minister has made several what I like to think of as vainglorious speeches with respect to proposed forthcoming development affecting shipping on the west coast.

Recent announcements of what is happening on the east coast have made me feel that, rather than development, we are going through a reverse process, that we are going through a process of under-development. Is the minister aware that Dart Container Line has joined with CP Ships and is intending to leave Halifax to operate a new container service out of Montreal?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am aware of the report. I am also aware of the media and press reports indicating the concern of the premiers. I shall have to check to find out whether any request has been made to the federal government, and, furthermore, to assist in this situation, I shall have to check as to whether there are any rights, powers or action that the federal government can properly take in interfering with a decision of private companies.

Senator Donahoe: I have a supplementary question for the minister. The minister has to some degree answered it already in his reply to my first question. I was going to ask him if he was able to confirm that despite a plea from Premier Buchanan to place a moratorium on the move, the Minister of Transport has said that it is unlikely that the federal government would attempt to block this move.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have already given an undertaking that I will look into the matter, to find out if such a request has been made, and, furthermore, if such a request has been made, to see if there is any law or regulation under which the federal government can, in fact, interfere with decisions that are made by private companies in this particular respect.

Senator Donahoe: I thank the minister, and ask a further supplementary. I take it from his answer that the minister is not able to confirm, or does not choose to confirm, that the statement I spoke of has been made by the Minister of Transport?

Senator Olson: No. I want to check with ministers because, while honourable senators opposite quote my colleagues with good intentions, at times a slightly different shade of meaning creeps into what is said. Therefore, I really have to be cautious, and I will check that out before I confirm it.

Senator Donahoe: My final question is as follows: Is the minister of the opinion that moves from the Atlantic provinces, such as the one I have just mentioned, are consistent with the government's DREE policy?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is like comparing apples and oranges. I do not think DREE is involved in this.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TREATIES—RATIFICATION BY UNITED STATES SENATE

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The Globe and Mail reports that U.S. officials regard as laughable the suggestion that Canada will require guarantees from the United States Senate before negotiating another bilateral treaty. Is there any substance to that report?

• (1410)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I have a point of order. I am speaking for Senator Olson who does not want anybody to base questions on press clippings.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I am sure that if there are supplementary questions for Senator Olson he will leap at the opportunity to reply.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Provided they are questions and not speeches.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the Washington correspondent of the Globe and Mail has reported in a front page story that United States officials regard as "laughable" suggestions that Canada, in view of recent experiences with bilateral treaties with the United States, would require guarantees from the United States Senate before negotiating another bilateral treaty. The correspondent, whose name, I believe, is Lawrence Martin, went on to say that a senior Canadian official had agreed that this proposal amounted to subverting the Constitution of the United States.

The Canadian official referred to is our ambassador in Washington, Ambassador Towe, who yesterday gave what he felt was a background, off-the-record briefing respecting President Reagan's visit for twelve Canadian correspondents. In addition to breaking the rules of this briefing, and scooping other correspondents with details of the President's program, Martin gave a completely false report of what Ambassador Towe said. The characterization attributed to Ambassador Towe was, in fact, that of the Globe and Mail correspondent.

The ambassador did not agree, but referred to the frustrations experienced by Canada over the failure of the United States Senate to ratify the fisheries treaty signed two years ago this month. That is a frustration well known to honourable senators, particularly those on the east and west coasts. In view of this experience, the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated to the press last month in New York that it would be unrealistic to expect the Canadian government to enter into other agreements without prior assurance of the support of the United States Senate.

Details of the program for President Reagan's visit will be released today in Ottawa, and a number of correspondents are being invited to hear them. Indeed, that press conference may by now have taken place.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

VISIT TO CANADA—PROPOSED AGENDA—ADDRESS TO PARLIAMENT

Hon. Peter Bosa: Can the Leader of the Government advise the Senate whether President Reagan is going to address both houses of Parliament?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Yes, the plan is that there will be an address to both houses of Parliament. There will also be a gala performance at the National Arts Centre, and I think a coast-to-coast television broadcast of that performance is being planned. The details of the program will be made known as soon as possible.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Will there be any business sessions?

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator asks, quite properly, whether there will be business sessions during the visit. Indeed there will. We regard this as much more than a mere social occasion, however important that may be. It is also an opportunity to discuss with our friends in the United States matters that have remained outstanding over the last few months. Senator Murray may even wish to suggest items for the proposed agenda.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Are you ready to table the agenda of the working sessions that will take place between the President and the Prime Minister during the visit?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if the agenda has now been released, an effort will be made to table it this afternoon. I had hoped to be in a position to table it at the outset of today's proceedings. Of course, it is important information for all honourable senators.

VISIT TO CANADA—PROPOSED AGENDA—TRANS-BORDER POLLUTION PROBLEMS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, it is always good to have the Leader of the Government here. When he is with us, this is a livelier and brighter place. I do not say we get much light, but it is certainly a brighter place.

I would like to ask about another matter that is clearly of tremendous importance. This is a matter, not a treaty, but a bilateral agreement. My question stems from the report that the minister's colleague, the Honourable John Roberts, has said that the United States government has largely ignored an agreement aimed at curbing acid rain and trans-border pollution problems.

● (1415)

He went on to say—and these are quotes, not the fault of poor Mr. Martin of the Globe and Mail—that he badgered officials of the Carter administration and got nowhere, and could not talk to the officials of the Reagan administration because it is so new. In the face of this pollution problem, I would like to know what the government is going to do when the President is here. Will this matter of pollution be put down as one of the major items for discussion? Clearly something has happened that should not have happened.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, reference has been made to an extremely critical and important matter, that of acid rain. I wish to provide the assurance that everything possible is being done to achieve an agreement with the United States on this point. Indeed, it would be somewhat surprising if that were not an item on the agenda for discussion between the President of the United States and the Right Honourable the Prime Minister.

Senator Macquarrie: Just on a point of clarification—and I know the minister wants to be precise and accurate in every way—the agreement with the United States has been made, but adherence to the agreement is what is lacking.

COMMUNICATIONS

ADVERTISING OF GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS—EXPENDITURES

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It seems to be his day, and I would not want to miss the chance to ask him a question.

During the past month some concern has been expressed in this place, in the other place, and by the public at large, about the government's advertising management group and the amounts of money that have been spent on the advertising of government programs at public expense. I understand that the estimated cost of this advertising will be in the vicinity of $60 million to $70 million. It seems to me, from what I read in the newspapers, that public acceptance of the government's approach to the problems of Canada, the government programs in terms of national unity and so on, has gone down dramatically. I wonder if the Leader of the Government could tell us if he considers these monies to be well and properly spent, or will there be a halt called to these programs?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government realizes, of course, that it has yet to achieve perfection in all of its endeavours, although it constantly attempts to do so. Some of the informational programs initiated by the government may not have resulted in the type of public support that may have been desirable, but that certainly is not criticizing the assiduous efforts made by this government to inform Canadians about the manner in which their tax dollars are spent and the services which are available to them in order for them to better their position, to launch new enterprises, to take advantage of certain programs designed to stimulate the economy, and so on. The government is constantly seeking new ways to communicate more effectively with the Canadian people.

Interestingly enough, I would say that in terms of population, budgets, and certain other criteria, provincial governments probably do far more advertising than does the Government of Canada. However, citizens must be kept aware of what governments are attempting to do.

Senator Doody: I was about to say that I have a supplementary, but it is really the same question. I appreciated the unpaid political announcement made from the other side of the chamber, and I respectfully sat and listened. However, my question is: Does the minister feel that the people of Canada have received good value for the $60 million or $70 million in advertising which has been spent on their behalf by the government? I watched with delight the flocks of geese flying across Canada, and I thought they were absolutely lovely, but I do not really feel they are worth $60 million or $70 million. I wonder if the minister could tell us—

Senator Steuart: Maybe he can tell us the difference between the geese and the goose.

Senator Doody: —if the government intends to continue this program, add to it or subtract from it. I read that the chairman of the advertising management group is quoted as having said that the actual expenditure would depend on "how this Constitution thing goes." Perhaps the honourable minister could tell us what that means. What has the Constitution to do with how much money this fellow Zarry decides that we are to spend?

• (1420)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the people of this country have the right to know the truth about certain programs initiated by the government which at times are under attack by members of the opposition.

Senator Murray: So you spend the taxpayers' money.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if the question is, "Does the government believe this is money well spent?" the answer is, yes, we think it is well spent. We shall endeavour to improve our methods of media communication in such a fashion that the people of this country will regard it as eminently fair.

Senator Doody: If I may ask one further supplementary, this Mr. Zarry seems to have latched on to a rather good thing. He is quoted as saying that there will also be new advertising campaigns in areas that, right now, are not clear. He went on to say that it just keeps building.

A few minutes ago Senator Steuart made a comment about the difference between the geese and the goose. Well, I don't think that I appreciate very much the fact that this fellow Zarry is going to keep building on the taxpayers' money. I would like to know if the Government of Canada feels that Mr. Zarry is equivalent to the President of the Treasury Board, or if it considers that he is simply a contractual employee of the Government of Canada.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I say that the previous Conservative government—

Senator Doody: I want to talk about this government, not the previous government.

Senator Perrault: Oh, no, honourable senators.

Senator Doody: Oh, yes!

Senator Perrault: I want to be balanced and fair with my reply, as I always endeavour to be.

Senator Asselin: You were badly advised by your deputy leader.

Senator Perrault: The previous government—

An Hon. Senator: Let's hear about the present government.

Senator Perrault: At the time the present government was elected by the Canadian people the previous government had in the planning stages one of the largest public relations and advertising campaigns ever known in the history of mankind.

Senator Murray: An advertising campaign about what?

Senator Olson: About everything; Tory policy.

Senator Perrault: The Conservatives were going to promote—

Senator Frith: It was about government programs; that is what it was about.

Senator Perrault: The Conservatives were going to promote—

Senator Smith: Just answer the question. Are you afraid to?

Senator Perrault: They were going to promote almost every form of government endeavour, and the Liberal opposition did not criticize that effort by the Conservative government to communicate. Why this sensitivity today on behalf of the official opposition?

Senator Smith: Because it hasn't happened.

Senator Perrault: A new consortium was formed by the Conservative party, a consortium made up of advertising agencies from coast to coast. We were not really critical of that fact. There were a few comments made.

Senator Frith: Ask them about Murray Consolidated Advertising Corporation.

Senator Asselin: You are being badly advised.

Senator Perrault: I am sure that people like Senator Murray had a great deal of input into this process.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Senators: Hah, hah.

Senator Perrault: Did we stand in our places and criticize that endeavour by the Conservatives to communicate to the Canadian people?

Senator Frith: After all, they were just trying to explain their programs.

Senator Perrault: If at some point honourable senators would like to have a debate on information programs, let me tell you that we have a document in our file which indicates the total extent of the planned Conservative campaign.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Perrault: It boggles the mind.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Doody: If I may say so, honourable senators, in my humble and polite opinion it would not take all that much to boggle the honourable senator's mind; but that is probably irrelevant to our present discussion. The question I asked was—well, after listening to that diatribe by the Leader of the Government, I really forget what I asked.

An Hon. Senator: Maybe his mind is boggled.

Senator Doody: The Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate delivered himself of a long dissertation on the policies and programs of the Conservative Party when it was in power last year or the year before last. We come right back to the same point again: If the government cannot answer a question properly, if it does not have the answers, if it is reluctant to give out information that might embarrass it, then the government spokesmen just weasel in behind the previous administration and slip and slide sideways and go into a verbal diatribe, refusing to give any information. As the Honourable Senator Marshall mentioned last night, Question Period is really becoming kind of ridiculous. No information is ever provided; it is merely an opportunity for honourable senators opposite to make political speeches.

● (1425)

Senator Guay: The opposition is making it ridiculous.

Senator Doody: Senator Guay is reluctant to add his voice to the conversation, although he knows that he has more information to offer to us than the honourable gentlemen to his left.

Senator Guay: That's right; I agree with you.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, let me put this proposal to you: How many times have honourable senators or members of the other place been approached by companies—for example, small industries—which are trying to become established so that they may become an effective taxpaying entity in our country, to learn that they were totally unaware of the government's program to help small business? Through advertising and public relations these companies are made aware of how they can become large companies and how they can employ more Canadians. How many times have we heard from senior citizens, for example, who have not been totally aware of the benefits available to them to fight against the high cost of inflation?

Senator Smith: So you fly some geese.

Senator Perrault: How many times have honourable senators heard from people in this country who are, for example, totally unaware of the veterans' benefits and programs of that kind? Is the official opposition arguing against this service?

Senator Roblin: It's the geese we do not like.

Senator Perrault: Is the official opposition arguing against informing the hard-working farmers of Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba and other parts of this country of their entitlements under certain programs?

Senator Marshall: It is like the Allstate Insurance advertising in the United States; it's a lot of bull.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I want to say that after several months into the fiscal year 1979-80 and while the Conservative government was in power, the total advertising budget of something like—and I speak subject to correction—$58 million was cut back by some $15 million. I was delighted to have played a part in identifying some of the more wasteful areas where cuts were made. As for the fiscal year 1980-81, the plan was to spend still less than the previous Liberal administration had forecast for the fiscal year 1979-80.

[Senator Doody.]

THE ESTIMATES

MEDIA BRIEFING—ADMISSION OF OPPOSITION MEMBERS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Lowell Murray: If I may have the indulgence of honourable senators for a moment, I would like to raise a question of privilege which arises from an exchange in the Senate last Thursday between the Leader of the Government and myself when I asked him whether his colleague, the President of the Privy Council, the Honourable Yvon Pinard, had told the Canadian Press that they could consider the publication embargo on the estimates lifted. The minister gave the following answer, which is reported at page 1867 of Hansard:

> Honourable senators, I was asked to provide a prompt reply to a question asked earlier today as to whether the house leader in the other place had stated that he had considered the embargo to be lifted. I have ascertained that the house leader, the Honourable Yvon Pinard, made no such statement, and I am now rather mystified about the murky sources of information available to the opposition forces in the chamber. Perhaps I am entitled to ask a question: Where did such a distorted question originate?

Not with the intention of prolonging the debate, but, rather, to complete the record, I would like to say that my question was based on a report of the Montreal Gazette of that day, which is attributed to both the Canadian Press wire service and Gazette writers, which reads, in part:

> The Progressive Conservatives blocked official presentation of government spending estimates in Parliament yesterday, staging a three-hour procedural wrangle. Government House Leader Yvon Pinard authorized publication of the estimates anyway.

To be more precise, the Canadian Press wire copy for the same day reads, in part:

> —Government House Leader Yvon Pinard argued that the Conservatives had broken the embargo by quoting figures from the estimates in the Commons.
> "The publication of information, in my view, wouldn't be of serious consequence," he told reporters.

From the Leader of the Government's statement at page 1867 of Hansard, I take it that the Honourable Yvon Pinard feels that that statement—"The publication of information, in my view, wouldn't be of serious consequence"—is not an authorization to lift the embargo. Obviously, the reporters thought it was an authorization to lift the embargo, and I think that opinion would be shared by most reasonable people.

● (1430)

I simply wanted to place those matters on the record in view of the reply by the minister to my question of last Thursday, and in order to complete the record on this matter.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, obviously the source, in this case, was the Montreal Gazette.

Senator Murray: And Canadian Press.

Senator Perrault: It is attributed to Canadian Press, but these are fragmentary newspaper reports. I am sure Senator Murray is not challenging the veracity of a respected minister of the Crown, Mr. Yvon Pinard.

However, there is one accurate passage in that Montreal Gazette report. It said that for three hours the Conservatives deliberately blocked an effort by this government to table the estimates—which is a shameful thing to do. That is an accurate passage in that report.

Senator Smith: You can take what you like and leave the rest.

Senator Perrault: It does not stand to the credit of the official opposition. That was not the kind of tactic that would win commendation for anyone interested in protecting the parliamentary system.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I wish to say that I am not and was not challenging the veracity of the Honourable Yvon Pinard or of anyone else. We will let the record stand that Mr. Pinard said:

> "The publication of information, in my view, wouldn't be of serious consequence,"

Mr. Pinard now claims, as the minister claims, that that was not an authorization to the media to lift the embargo on the estimates.

COMMUNICATIONS

ADVERTISING OF GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS—EXPENDITURES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Earlier, an honourable senator alleged that there had been a reduction in planned advertising expenditures by the previous government. This is a field in which he obviously demonstrated a great deal of interest when he was actively involved in the day-to-day activities of that government and he may have developed some expertise in the field. I must accept the figure he has cited and that, as planned, there were certain reductions in advertising expenditures.

The honourable senator, however, is equally aware of the fact that information programs must be geared to the needs of the times. If additional programs require additional amounts of money for publicity and advertising purposes, then those programs must go ahead.

The true test of a communications program, surely, is whether the content is fair and balanced and whether it represents an honest effort to communicate with the people of the country.

Senator Smith: A wild goose chase.

Senator Perrault: It is with interest that I note there is no real attack on the content of those programs.

THE SENATE

REVISION OF DESCRIPTIVE BROCHURE FOR VISITORS TO GALLERIES

Hon. Peter Bosa: My question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Considering the coming tourist season, would the Leader of the Government inform this chamber whether there is any intention of updating the seating plan and distributing the brochure to visitors to the galleries of the Senate?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator has raised an excellent point. Obviously, our own communications must be improved. I hope that honourable senators will support the expenditure of a modest amount to ensure that the Senate is properly presented to the thousands of visitors who stream in here, particularly during the summer.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Has any progress been made in considering the suggestion I made about three years ago to improve the format of the brochure we give to gallery visitors, by including more text and fewer pictures, so that visitors to this chamber will better understand what the Senate is all about?

In that connection, at least three or four years ago I gave to various people in authority a sample of the excellent brochure used in the House of Lords, but nothing has happened. Would the Leader of the Government find out if any progress has been made?

Senator Perrault: Both honourable senators make a valid point. It seems to me that there should be an updating of the literature distributed in connection with our activities here. This is a matter that the Internal Economy Committee might wish to discuss at the earliest opportunity.

Certainly, in my view, the material presently being distributed is now out-dated, and needs revision with more text being incorporated, as suggested by Senator Godfrey.

Hon. Robert Muir: I would inform the Leader of the Government that the Internal Economy Committee has discussed this and the matter is in hand. I would note that the chairman of that committee is not present today since he is away on other business. However, I am sure he will have a report for the chamber.

Senator Perrault: I am very glad to hear that; that is good news. I was not present at the meeting when that was discussed.

THE CONSTITUTION

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, before I begin my very few and very brief comments, I would be remiss if I did not add my voice to those who have congratulated the members of the special joint committee, from both sides of both houses, on the magnificent job they did during the long and arduous weeks of hearings and debate. People who watched the proceedings on television could not but be favourably impressed by both the conduct and the ability of the committee members. We, in the Senate, indeed all the people of Canada, owe those committee members a great debt. They have raised the public perception of the parliamentary process immeasurably, and, indeed, have raised the credibility of legislatures across Canada tremendously in the eyes of the public.

I am reasonably certain that it will come as no surprise to honourable senators to learn that I fully intend to vote against the government's proposed constitutional package that is before us. In so doing, I have the comforting knowledge that I am standing with the vast majority of Canadians who also oppose this measure—the great majority of Canadians not only in my own province or even in the Atlantic region, but in every province and territory from coast to coast of this great nation.

Many times during the course of this great debate, honourable senators, we have heard enumerated the list of those opposed to this package. Some have appeared before the committee or have submitted briefs, and their worries, fears and apprehensions are well documented. The representations of the vast majority of the Canadian people, these very concerned and articulate people, these individuals, groups, provinces and political parties, have had no effect on this government's bullheaded decision to push this package through, substantially in the form which aroused the opposition of the Canadian people as the committee sessions went on.

This government, this arrogant group of determined men, is impervious to these repeated loud and legitimate cries of protest from those very people whom they purport to represent, and by whom they were elected. Honourable senators, it is being done, we are told, for our own good. No matter that at least eight provinces are strongly opposed, and no matter that the large majority of Canadians are opposed, we are told that it must be done.

Honourable senators, it is not really being done by the government, or by a small group. We all know that the force, the drive, the obsession is that of one man who has convinced himself and those around him that this odious package must be sent to Westminster—a loathsome and shameful process—to be acted on. Despite the fact he knows full well that most Canadians, in all regions, are opposed, he persists because he says it is good for us, and we must have it, in his image and likeness, whether we like it or not, whether we want it or not. We must have it via the British Parliament. He says that the end result—the patriation of our Constitution—is good, and so the means that he employs to attain that end are unimportant. The end, in this case, justifies the means!

This has to be one of the most dangerous, wrongful lines of thought ever pursued by man. There is no end to the crimes and evils that have been inflicted on mankind down through the ages by people who have used this kind of reasoning to justify their ambitious goals. This is the same type of reasoning that allows one country to vow the liberation of another, even if it means the mutilation and misery of millions of those to be liberated; the kind of reasoning that makes a mockery of human rights of any sort, entrenched, enshrined or whatever; and the sort of reasoning that sends a Charter of Rights to the Parliament of the United Kingdom for enactment, while denying the Parliament of Canada the right to do that here in Canada.

● (1440)

We, in Canada, surely must have the right to pass our own Bill of Rights. Not so. We must, it seems, have the Parliament of the United Kingdom do it for us. We get rid of colonialism through the weird process of humbly entreating Her Majesty's United Kingdom Parliament to pass certain laws for and on behalf of her Canadian colony, much the same humiliating process that the Dominion of Newfoundland was forced to endure in the hungry thirties.

I never imagined a proud Canadian government could court this humiliation so willingly. At least, we in Newfoundland can say we were forced through debt, hunger and poverty to crawl to Westminster—a better reason than the blind ambition we witness now.

Honourable senators, I will say little on the Charter of Rights. The principle of human rights is a good one. No one, I hope, could be against this basic cornerstone of our lives. I cannot help but feel, however, that we are passing over to the courts some of the authority and responsibility of Parliament. It seems to me that the more lists of rights that are written, the more unclear and vague some of these rights seem to be. The government seems to be very proud of its inclusion of a section dealing with the rights of women, but it is quite clear that many women in Canada are not happy with this section. It does not really provide the answer to the problems that have been raised, and yet we have a section in the Charter of Rights dealing with the rights of women. Are we going to pass this section anyway, and let the courts tidy it up later, or will we tidy it up ourselves later? I don't know.

What of the aboriginal rights? We have heard a great deal of self-congratulation on the other side concerning this item, but exactly what rights are we so grandly recognizing as the rights of our native peoples? We know that the native peoples have had rights for some time. We all have rights, but the native peoples don't know any more today what those rights are than they knew before this grandiose pronouncement. What amending formula will apply to the recognition of the native peoples' rights in that Constitution? Are they to be left to the mercy of the federal government or some combination of the federal and provincial governments, or are the amendments to be made through some new process yet to be displayed or dreamed up?

Senator Steuart last evening said he hoped it would work out well and that some good arrangement could be made. We all hope some help is on the way, but is this the way to write a Constitution? The government does not know what these programs, policies or processes will be. I do not think we should be asked to vote for them.

Honourable senators, that very vital and basic question of property rights is completely ignored in the document which we are humbly sending to Great Britain. In point of fact, property rights are not even mentioned. Quite apart from the native peoples' concern regarding this item—and it is a very big concern, their concept of property ownership being quite different from the concept which most of us have been brought up with—the basic rights of Canadians to hold property is passed over completely. The reason given is that some of the provinces were opposed to the entrenchment of property rights—at least, that is the only reason that I can determine. I say it is the only reason I can determine, but surely there must be another one. There are many sections of the proposed package with which the provinces do not agree. Indeed, as has been noted time and time again, at least eight of the provinces are opposed to the package as presented.

Honourable senators, I fear that, in pursuing the course of entrenching the Charter of Rights, we will be moving toward a situation in which the United States system, or a facsimile of it, will replace our own system which, in my opinion, is by far the better of the two. But I am sure there are many who disagree with me, and to continue the arguments pro and con entrenchment is simply to distract from other principles involved.

The principle of rights, as I have said, is certainly acceptable. The principle of asking the Parliament of the United Kingdom to debate, and hopefully pass, the Charter of Rights and the other components of the Canadian Constitution for the people of Canada is totally unacceptable.

To say, as Senator Austin said in committee, that these items have been debated and discussed in Canada and are, therefore, Canadian, is irrelevant. The point is that we are asking the British to enact Canadian law for us. This is degrading! To place the nation of Canada in this abject state of colonial servility is disgraceful—and this in 1981, our year of Canadian national maturity.

On the Charter of Rights, or more precisely, on rights generally, I have one final comment. The statements and inferences that have emanated from government spokesmen during the course of these discussions seem to suggest that the federal government is the only champion of human rights. This is an unfortunate and misleading position. The recognition and protection of rights has been at least as much the concern of the provincial governments as of the federal government. Transgressions and violations of these various rights, on the rare occasions when they have occurred, found each of the two levels of government at fault.

I suspect, honourable senators, that some rare infractions of rights will continue to occur from time to time, whether or not some or all of these rights are entrenched or not. Such a violation of rights is going on right now—the rights of the people of Canada, of the provincial governments of Canada, to work within the Canadian processes and conventions to make their own Constitution here in Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Doody: It will be sent to Westminster for enactment. The will of the majority in Parliament is the only right that we witness in Canada today, and this is the majority dominated by one man.

What we are asked to do in this chamber, and in this Parliament, is to pass this resolution in defiance of the federal system which has evolved over a period of years, and which has served Canada and its people over those years. We are asked to pass this document, and in so doing, perhaps place the Canadian federation in serious peril. Honourable senators, this is folly in its extreme.

We are being asked to approve this package in the face of the deep, sincere, vocal opposition of at least eight of the eleven governments of Canada. This is not federalism. This is arrogance and autocracy, not federal democracy. The personal ambition of one man, no matter how well-meaning, cannot justify the peril in which we place our country. The fact that Mr. Trudeau tells us that this package is good for Canadians is not sufficient reason for us to support it, for approval of this package could cause strains and cracks in Canada which could cause problems for years to come.

How great those problems might be, I cannot say. I submit that no one in this chamber or the other place knows, with certainty, any more than I do, so the risk is unacceptable. There is little sense in forcing this package down the throats of Canadians if we end up with no Canada or a country ridden with distrust and bitterness. To have the Constitution in Canada is highly desirable; to have this package in Canada, via Westminster, is not only undesirable but is highly dangerous!

Honourable senators, I share the view of most Canadians that the Canadian Constitution should reside in Canada. But I also share the view of most Canadians that it should be a Canadian Constitution, made and passed in Canada, not a nationally divisive document passed by the United Kingdom Parliament, and guaranteed to cause bad feelings for years to come in our country.

I would like to say a few words on the proposed document. I realize that honourable senators have heard it all before, and from far greater orators than I will ever be. The magnificent speeches of my old friend, Senator Macquarrie, and my colleague in many constitutional intergovernmental affairs discussions over the years, Senator Tremblay, and the superbly researched speech of Senator Thompson, and others, were so profound, so forceful, and so well delivered, that I sometimes wonder at my audacity to stand in their presence. I was particularly impressed by the delightful performance of Senator Steuart last evening. In all sincerity, honourable senators—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: It was very amusing.

Senator Doody: —the trauma of his conversion detracted somewhat from the impact of his speech.

Senator Perrault: Remember St. Paul.

Senator Doody: I remember him well and he must blanch in your presence.

I respectfully implore your indulgence and your tolerance, honourable senators, for a few more minutes as I conclude, otherwise I might be provoked into becoming partisan. Heaven forbid!

● (1450)

Senator Frith: Is that possible?

Senator Doody: In present company, extremely likely.

Honourable senators, let me speak for just a few moments to the proposed Constitution itself. I wish to look at the principle of having two types of province, which is embedded in the document before us. There is the image of two types of province presented to us, and I do not consider it to be an acceptable proposal. There are some provinces with greater value, greater wealth, greater status, greater potential than others. That principle is enunciated very clearly in the amending formula: two provinces with absolute veto, and the other provinces with lesser status. You might say that those two provinces are big and powerful, and perhaps, when my own second-class province grows up and gets in with the crowd, we may be allowed to sit above the salt too; we may be allowed to evolve from the common herd of lesser provinces and become one of the big ones; and the people of P.E.I., British Columbia, Nova Scotia and those other provinces can also aspire to the big leagues. But, honourable senators, under the set of rules—

Senator Frith: They are first-class senators.

Senator Doody: Most senators in this chamber are first-class senators. I hesitate to make exceptions.

Senator Murray: Unless provoked.

Senator Doody: My modesty compels me to reply that I do not include myself in the second class. I can assure honourable senators that if they cease interrupting, I will get through my speech more quickly and everyone will be much more comfortable; so, if you will just bear with me for a few moments, I will continue my diatribe.

The set of rules that we play with in Canada today is different from the set of rules which would allow provinces to aspire to the top rank. As an example, I would describe the condition in Newfoundland as it is now set forth. Newfoundlanders may not at this point in time aspire to greatness. We can aspire to move from dependency to mediocrity, but never can we aspire to joining the elite; for, you see, we have been told in a public statement by the present government—

Senator Olson: I don't agree with that.

Senator Doody: Just bear with me for a second. If the honourable senator agreed with me, I would think there was something wrong with my logic.

[Senator Doody.]

We have been told by the present government—of which the minister who has just spoken is one of the more articulate and intelligent, and God help the country—that we may keep our own provincial income, for the purpose of public expenditure, the revenue from the Hibernia discoveries and the possible revenue from other such resource finds in the offshore area; and Newfoundland may continue to get that revenue in total until, and only until, we reach the national average. Then, honourable senators, the revenue is to be diverted to Ottawa. If we fall below the national average, presumably we get some more cash.

An Hon. Senator: It is shared.

Senator Doody: That is not the last offer.

Senator Frith: Yes, it is.

Senator Doody: That is a public statement that was made, that we will be allowed to retain all the revenue from the Hibernia find until we reach the national average—

Senator Olson: That is where it remains at 100 per cent.

Senator Doody: —and then, when we reach the national average, once again we are allowed to stay there. This concept of built-in national average is absolutely repugnant and cannot be acceptable when we are not allowed to aspire, to reach above that level. Honourable senators can shake their heads and say, "That is not what was intended," but I am telling them that that is what was said.

Senator Olson: That is a distorted argument.

Senator Molgat: Will the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Doody: Certainly.

Senator Molgat: Are you saying that after it has reached the national average, the province of Newfoundland would not share at all?

Senator Doody: No, I did not say that.

Senator Molgat: That is the inference.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Molgat: That is certainly the inference you have left, if you are saying that is where it ends. Make yourself clear.

Senator Doody: I am trying to, but I keep being interrupted.

Senator Molgat: Start off by being clear.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators will have to put their own interpretation on clarity in their own particular areas and in their own way. I can only be responsible for what I say, not for how the honourable senator interprets what I have said. What I said was that the Government of Canada has said that the total revenue from the Hibernia area will go entirely to the Government of Newfoundland until Newfoundland reaches the national average. That is right. After that, the revenues will be diverted to Ottawa.

Senator Olson: No; there are different percentages.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators will get into all sorts of trouble, physically and emotionally, if they don't relax a minute. I am saying that we then get into some kind of sharing arrangement.

Senator Molgat: Ah, all right.

Senator Doody: That does not bring us above the national average.

Senator Asselin: You are so excited.

Senator Doody: I am saying that we are guaranteed middle-class status in perpetuity; we will forever be getting the national average. That concept is insulting to everyone in Canada, everywhere in Canada, and I consider that clarification should be made publicly by honourable senators who are just as upset by this as I am. Surely, everyone in Canada should have the right to aspire to the ultimate. If it is not attainable for some reason or other, so be it; but, at least, such aspirations should not be denied in advance.

Anyway, the principle of special status is demonstrated in the amending formula itself. Special arrangements are made for Prince Edward Island and the Atlantic region—and they should be, because of the way this weird formula is designed. But the same problems are present in the Manitoba and Saskatchewan position, and no effort is made to correct that situation. That is unacceptable, and I would submit that it is unworkable.

Senator Asselin: Good enough.

Senator Doody: We cannot, in Canadian society, institutionalize inequality. I know that in a free society, in a country as huge and regionally different as ours, such differences are inevitable. In an evolving free society, such as Canadian society, total equality is impossible, even total equality of opportunity. Economic pressures, population shifts and other factors will make differences occur from time to time and from region to region. Hence, this magnificent concept of equalization—a concept which, ironically, is to be written into our proposed Constitution side by side with the elitist principle of inequality found in the amending formula. When one considers the tremendous political clout of the two provinces which are to be given the veto—political clout by virtue of their very large representation in the Commons—one must seriously doubt the motives of the framers of the document.

To further underline the inequality, the unfairness, of the proposed amending formula, we must consider the infamous referendum clause itself. Under this delightful arrangement, a referendum can be set in motion by the federal government, and only by the federal government, and that same federal government is dominated by the large representation of the two provinces which have already been given an absolute veto power. How anyone in this chamber can justify that particular arrangement is beyond my comprehension.

I fully understand, honourable senators, the sentiments and the position of Senator Cook, a fellow Newfoundlander of whom I and all Newfoundlanders, regardless of political conviction, feel justifiably proud.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Doody: I hope that other honourable senators will find it in their hearts to demonstrate the courage of their convictions, just as Senator Cook has.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Doody: The idea of having a referendum procedure at hand, as a standard part of the amending formula, is a dangerous one. To have it in the hands of only one of the 11 partners in Confederation is to compound the danger.

Honourable senators, I fully intended to go into more detail on the various contentious parts of the proposed package, but, as I said earlier, it has been well said before by many members of both houses. I intended to refer to the omission of God and of the family—those ill-advised and unfortunate omissions from the proposed Constitution; but my friend, Senator Macdonald, voiced my sentiments a few days ago, and I thank him for it.

In conclusion, let me ask honourable senators to consider that there is still time to think about it. A proposal was made in the committee to split the package, to ask the United Kingdom Parliament to give us simple patriation with the Vancouver formula. We know that a consensus of premiers can be found based on those items. If we do that, which is simplicity itself, Canada will be the better for it. If we persist in the course that we are now following, it could very well be a very dangerous and perhaps disastrous course.

• (1500)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Would the honourable senator permit a question, for clarification?

Senator Doody: Surely.

Senator Frith: You used the term "national average". The purport of the agreement, or negotiation, as I understood it, was that 100 per cent of the revenue from the offshore resources would go to Newfoundland until that province ceased receiving equalization payments, at which point it would have to contribute, though the formula was never set. When the honourable senator speaks of a national average, is that what he means?

Senator Doody: When I was involved in these discussions, the offer by the Government of Canada to the eastern provinces was a 75-25 sharing split. We never could ascertain what the net was. It has always been very difficult to define what comes out of the gross before you get to the net and the 75-25.

What was perhaps even more important to the provinces, and particularly to my province, was a lack of control over the rate of development. The social factors in the province are obviously quite different from perhaps the needs of the Government of Canada in terms of the balance of payments, cash flow, and so on.

Since I got out of that scene another offer has been made to the provinces which I understand to be that 100 per cent of the revenue will go to the province until the province reaches the national average—not until it reaches the point where it is not entitled to equalization payments. I think that with the exception of Alberta right now, under the formula, the only provinces that are really not entitled to equalization are Ontario and British Columbia; and with regard to Ontario that is only because of the act that we passed in this place a couple of weeks ago.

The national average is the basis of the formula by which equalization is distributed. The national average is the average income that is taken across Canada, and it is the average, literally, of that. It is not the highest, which is British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario; it is the average of all 10.

Senator Frith: Well, honourable senators, I had thought that during the last discussions exactly those words were used, namely, "until the province stopped receiving equalization payments." But I can always look it up, and if I am right I can put it on the record when my time comes.

Senator Doody: It could very well be. If so, it is an entirely different ball game.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Would the honourable senator permit another question?

Senator Doody: Certainly.

Senator Molgat: Could the honourable senator tell us what kind of sharing there is between the provincial government and the national government after the national average is reached?

Senator Doody: My understanding of the matter is that the revenue will then go into the national revenue pot, and if there is an equalization entitlement, then Newfoundland will get its proportionate share of that equalization, like the other provinces.

Senator Molgat: And there is no direct share to the province involved?

Senator Doody: As I say, under the first arrangement, 75-25, the province involved will get a direct entitlement. Up to the equalization, or the average standard, my understanding is that the revenue will go into that common pot. I would certainly welcome an elaboration on this, because the people in Newfoundland have the understanding that I have just delivered to honourable senators.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Will the honourable senator permit one more question?

Senator Doody: Go ahead.

Senator Nurgitz: No speeches!

Senator Olson: When the honourable senator began his speech he praised the committee, which was an essential part of the process in bringing forward the resolution which is now before us.

Senator Smith: He did not praise it at all.

Senator Olson: Yes, he did. He praised the joint chairmen, all the members of the committee, and just about everything that went on in that process.

Senator Smith: Except the result!

[Senator Doody.]

Senator Olson: That is the next point. Then he agreed, as I understood him, with the content of the resolution. He concluded, however, by opposing the process. I do not understand that kind of logic.

Senator Smith: Or, we might add, any logic.

Senator Doody: What was the question? I owe you that one, from way back!

Senator Olson: The question is: Could the honourable senator give some explanation of how he arrives at the conclusion that he should oppose the process that he began his speech by praising, even praising most of the content that was delivered out of the process, and yet winds up opposing the process? I am trying to find some rationalization for that logic.

Senator Doody: The process in question is that of sending this package to the United Kingdom and having them enact Canadian laws on our behalf, to the accompaniment of the washing and airing of all this laundry that has been going on in Canada over the past years, and its exhibition for public amusement in the United Kingdom. If the honourable senator does not feel any repugnance or distaste or discomfort as a result of all this, and if he cannot see anything wrong with it, there is no point in my trying to enlighten him. Obviously, it is beyond him.

Hon. Charles McElman: Could I ask a question of the Honourable Senator Doody? It is a very simple question, Mr. Leader of the Opposition, from a very simple person.

Senator Flynn: Just at the level of Senator Langlois.

Senator McElman: Have fun.

Senator Doody, you mentioned the earlier arrangement—the 75-25—

Senator Doody: You mean the earlier proposal.

Senator McElman: —proposal. For New Brunswick it was an arrangement. New Brunswick actually signed an agreement.

My recollection of that was that it was 75 to the province and 25 to the federal authority; but out of that 25 per cent the federal government would pay all administrative costs. That is my understanding of the New Brunswick arrangement. Was that the arrangement you spoke of for Newfoundland, as it was proposed?

Senator Doody: That was the same arrangement exactly. The administrative costs were to be borne out of the 25 per cent federal share. Where the 100 per cent would come from—and that would include the royalties, taxes, lease rights, and so on—was never properly explained or given out; but New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, in all fairness, were satisfied at that time with that arrangement. Newfoundland never did feel comfortable with it.

Hon. Harry Hays: Honourable senators, first, I would like to say how stimulating I found the experience of being one of the joint chairmen of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution. I learned a lot about the members of the Senate, about the dedication of members of Parliament, and about the great work that they did on this committee. The first few times we met I had the impression that the members of the committee were a group of people who did not know one another very well and who did not know exactly what was going to take place. Then, as the committee settled down to its task, I feel quite sure that many members made lasting friendships, regardless of their political stripe.

In this chamber this afternoon I see, across the way, Senator Asselin and Senator Tremblay. These two men missed very few of the meetings of the committee. They generally supported the various clauses we were dealing with, and were generally supportive of the witnesses we were examining, with the object of trying to see if we could improve upon the proposed charter.

From my side of this chamber, Senator Lamontagne, Senator Molgat, Senator Petten and Senator Lucier were present; and I could list many more. After all, 131 members of Parliament sat on the committee during the three and a half months that we discussed the resolution. No less than 51 senators—over half the Senate membership—at one time or another were around the table making their contribution. As I say, it was a stimulating experience.

Furthermore, I had the opportunity of working with a very bright young man from the House of Commons, Mr. Serge Joyal, and that was also a great experience. We sat for 306 hours, and I do not think we had one cross word. I would often say to him when he chaired a meeting, "Down on my ranch we let them have a pretty loose rope." That is the way we tried to do it. I do not think we cut anybody off if he had a contribution to make. Sometimes, when a witness was allotted one hour, we gave him three and a half hours. It just was not the case that we choked anybody off.

• (1510)

I would like to thank all the people we had an opportunity to work with. If we had not had such a group of people, it would have been an unpleasant experience; and I think it was anything but that.

Honourable senators, we are in the midst of a very important debate on a serious matter. Some say that the future of our country is at stake. The passage by the Parliament of Westminster of the resolution we are debating would at last complete the process started in 1864, that of creating a fully sovereign nation called Canada.

At that time the Fathers of Confederation, a relatively small group of men who were involved in the political process of the colonies, met and debated the future of the British colonies in North America. After much discussion they went to London, and the result was the British North America Act, the cornerstone of the Canadian Constitution.

The Statute of Westminster represented a major change and a major step forward in Canada's constitutional development. It placed into legislative form the accepted principle that members of the Commonwealth were sovereign bodies. Today, Canada alone is still not fully sovereign. Canada must go to Westminster to secure changes in its Constitution. There have been many amendments made to the British North America Act: to include new provinces in our nation and to enact amendments which are necessary from the point of view of economic and social security. Never before, though, have the Canadian people themselves been directly involved in the process. Never before have the deliberations on amendments to the Canadian Constitution been available to citizens of this country for their input.

Before proceeding further, I would like to take this opportunity to thank the clerks of the joint committee, Mr. Richard Pregent, of the House of Commons committees branch, and Mr. Paul Bélisle of our own committees branch. There were weeks when these two men and their staff worked almost 24 hours a day, preparing minutes of meetings long after the committees members and witnesses had gone home, and yet they would be back in the morning for steering committee meetings. Their services were invaluable. I would also like to thank Mr. Peter Dobell, the Director of the Parliamentary Centre, who offered his services to the committee, without remuneration, to aid in selecting a representative group of witnesses and in co-ordinating their appearance before the committee. He kept the committee creditable.

The committee heard submissions from 104 groups and individuals covering a very wide spectrum of Canadian society: women's groups; organizations representing the poor in this country; civil liberties and human rights organizations; the business community; the aboriginal peoples; the handicapped; and groups representing the multicultural aspect and heritage of our nation. The committee heard from minority language groups, churches, a group representing children, an environmental group, representatives of provincial political parties and four provincial governments.

As honourable senators who sat around the table know, the committee sat for 176½ hours with the witnesses alone, not counting the time spent with Mr. Chrétien and Mr. Kaplan—267 hours, all told. The committee listened. Its members asked questions and took note of the points presented by those concerned Canadians who appeared before it to give Parliament and all Canadians an understanding of the views, ideals and problems of fellow Canadians.

The committee listened to the criticisms of clause 1 of the Charter of Rights by Mr. Gordon Fairweather, Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission; by the Canadian Civil Liberties Association; by the Canada West Foundation; by the Advisory Council on the Status of Women; by the Council for Yukon Indians; and by many other groups. And that clause was changed. The committee listened to the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, the Canadian Association for the Mentally Retarded, and the Coalition of Provincial Organizations of the Handicapped with regard to the necessity for including the handicapped in the enumeration of bases upon which there should not be discrimination.

Regarding the clause on equal rights, the committee listened to 18 organizations representing aboriginal peoples, including the National Indian Brotherhood, the Inuit Committee on National Issues, and the Native Council of Canada, and was convinced that the rights of aboriginal peoples should now be included in the resolution, before the Constitution is patriated. All the amendments proposed, all the amendments made and all the clauses added to and included in the resolution came about as a result of the submissions of witnesses, because they did appear and because the committee did listen. One hundred and seven amendments were proposed to the original resolution, and 66 of those amendments were carried and appear in the revised resolution before us today.

It is my deepest regret, however, honourable senators, that only four provinces and two territories made representations to the committee. The committee was prepared to hear from the provinces for days if necessary, but six provincial premiers—including my own premier, Mr. Lougheed—did not see fit to send provincial delegations to give the position of their provinces, nor to represent the interests of their citizens. These same premiers can claim that the federal government singlemindedly refuses to negotiate or to discuss the package with them, but in effect is that not what these premiers have done? They have refused to represent their constituents before a committee made up of all parties in Parliament: 131 members of the House of Commons and 51 senators, at all times divided almost equally as between east and west. In fact, they have refused to make their position clear to duly elected representatives of residents of the provinces they govern. The Joint Committee on the Constitution was there to listen. It did listen. Because groups and individuals were concerned enough to appear before it and to educate the committee members, changes were made to the resolution. There is no doubt in my mind that, had the other six provinces wished to appear before the committee, we were prepared to receive them at any time, without notice, if necessary, up until the last day. So I believe that this resolution package could possibly have been improved upon.

Senator Flynn: In what way?

Senator Hays: Could you ask your question when I have finished? The Honourable Leader of the Opposition will understand that I am trying to concentrate.

As an Albertan, I am very sorry that Mr. Lougheed chose to ignore the committee. Whatever the political differences that divide us, he is the premier of my province and he does represent the interests of Albertans. I agree wholeheartedly with the principle expressed by Mr. Grant Notely, the leader of the New Democratic Party in Alberta, whose party appeared before the committee, when he said:

> We feel that there are some important changes that have to be made in the resolution and important changes, not only to the country, but from our vantage point as Albertans, crucial changes should be made, and as a consequence, we feel that Alberta's elected officials should be making representations on those changes before this Committee.

● (1520)

The people of Alberta deserved Mr. Lougheed's representations. Indeed, Mr. Lougheed had the obligation to represent before the committee the people who had elected him. As an Albertan, I was pleased to see that both the New Democratic Party, the official opposition in Alberta, and the Social Credit Party, represented by its leader Mr. Rod Sykes, saw fit to act responsibly and to express the views of the people of Alberta to the rest of the country. Instead of doing that, Mr. Lougheed chose to go to Montreal to speak to the people of Montreal. He was willing to explain Alberta's position to a province whose government is committed to breaking up this country by pulling Quebec out of Confederation, but he was not willing to represent two million Albertans before a committee which included, incidentally, six elected members from Alberta as well as myself and Senator Bielish.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Hays: This was a committee which was trying to build a new, stronger Canada. There may be only two million Albertans, and two million Albertans does not constitute a large portion of the Canadian population, but I sincerely believe that their views, as expressed by their duly elected government, should have been presented, and I believe that Mr. Lougheed let them down.

I have noticed there is a feeling among Canadians that, because Mr. Lougheed did not appear before the joint committee, Albertans do not care about the resolution before the committee and before us. Honourable senators, 99 submissions were received from Alberta by the committee. From Ontario there were 294 submissions, and from British Columbia there were 100 submissions. In terms of the numbers of submissions by provinces, Alberta was third after Ontario and British Columbia.

The committee heard directly from the Alberta Chamber of Commerce, from the Indian Association of Alberta, from the Alberta Social Credit Party, the Alberta New Democratic Party, the Campaign for Life and the Canadian Bar Association. These were all represented by Albertans, and, in turn, these groups represented perhaps most of the people in Alberta. Albertans do care about Canada. They do care about the Constitution and about patriation. The members of the committee know that Albertans are interested in participating in the future of Canada. I only wish more Canadians were aware of that fact.

At the outset of my remarks I said that I would express my views, and I mean to do so. The committee's work has been praised by members of Parliament from both chambers and from all sides, by all parties. The committee was successful in providing a forum for discussion of fundamental changes in Canada's Constitution. Because the proceedings were televised, Canadians were given the opportunity to watch the process.

As members of this chamber are aware—and I think particularly of Senator Goldenberg—despite all the excitement about the fact that the proceedings of the committee were to be televised, it was the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, chaired by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, that pioneered the use of electronic means for broadcasting parliamentary committee proceedings, when its proceedings were televised in 1977.

I am of the opinion, however, that the broadcasting of committee proceedings is not to the benefit of any committee or its work. I want to make it clear that that is not because I believe Canadians do not have the right to know what goes on in committees. Nor am I opposed to advancement or to change. What does concern me about the broadcasting of parliamentary committee proceedings is that the mere fact of broadcasting the proceedings sets a tone to the proceedings which tends to undermine their value. Senators know that the committees on which they work operate largely without partisan bias. The ability to get on with the job of the committee without the kind of obstruction that is typical of the other place results in the tremendous productivity of our Senate committees. The latest example of the good work of a Senate committee can be seen in the report of Senator McGrand's subcommittee on childhood experiences as causes of criminal behaviour, entitled Child at Risk.

During the in camera sessions of the joint committee, all the committee members, from all parties, made contributions in the spirit of co-operation, which I think was greater than during the broadcast deliberations because they did not have anyone to impress. In saying that, I do include members of my own party as well.

Broadcasting committee proceedings tends to enhance partisanship among committee members. At the risk of offending my friends on all sides, including members of my own party, I must say that it tends to promote grandstanding. Certainly, all the members of a committee should have the opportunity to express their views, whatever those views may be; but, in my opinion, show business has no place in the decision-making process of a committee.

Despite this adverse broadcasting aspect, the Joint Committee on the Constitution was productive. The resolution before us today is substantially different from, and better than, the one we were presented with on November 6. All the changes to it were made by Canadians in Canada. Constitutional change is necessary in any country. The British North America Act of 1867 was not the same as the act we have today. Twenty-two amendments have been made to it over the years. For example, an amendment made it possible for Newfoundland to join Canada; an amendment established Medicare; amendments established the Canada Pension Plan and unemployment insurance. No one can say that those amendments were not for the good of all Canadians, and I sincerely believe that the amendments to be made to the Canadian Constitution by the passage of this resolution by the Parliament at Westminster will also be for the good of the Canadian people.

The committee, in fact, spent most of its time on that part of the resolution most directly affecting the people of Canada—the Charter of Rights. Most of the groups which appeared before the committee presented their views on how such a charter would affect that aspect of that segment of Canadian society with which they were directly concerned. The overwhelming majority supported the entrenchment of a Charter of Rights. With the patriation of the Constitution, including a Charter of Rights, all of those groups and individuals—indeed, all Canadians—will have their rights entrenched wherever they may live across this country. In my opinion, the amendments that will be made to the Constitution, including the entrenchment of a Charter of Rights, will make Canada a better place in which to live for all Canadians.

Eighteen groups appeared before the committee to represent the aboriginal peoples, and because they were able to convince the committee that they have real problems and real grievances, amendments were introduced to the resolution to better the position of the native people of this country. Personally, I am pleased that the aboriginal peoples will be recognized in the Constitution and that the native peoples of this country will have entrenched in the Constitution their treaty, their traditional land rights and their rights as a distinct cultural entity—their rights as a people.

The committee heard moving testimony from the Nishga Tribal Council. Chief James Gosnell pointed out that:

> —in the first Constitution of this country, this nation, our people, the Indian people, were never given an opportunity to express ourselves. In every one of the laws affecting our people throughout Canadian history, never at any time were our people ever approached . . . This is the first opportunity that we have had to express ourselves.

Let me repeat that last statement: "This is the first opportunity that we have had to express ourselves." Indeed, honourable senators, this is the first opportunity for all Canadians to express themselves on their Constitution.

Mr. Bill Tooshkenig, of the Association of Iroquois and Allied Indians, made the following statement—and I am sure he would agree that it would apply equally to all native peoples:

> If we had the facilities and resources to get the message across as to what Indians actually want to the people of Canada, they would support the Indian position.

I rather agree with that, honourable senators. I have lived beside two reserves since the day I was born, and yet I never really did understand the Indian problems until, on the committee, we listened to these people for days and days. I have now, at last, come to the conclusion that their problems can be resolved.

Honourable senators, their appearance before the committee resulted in the inclusion of clause 33 and the amendment of clause 24, and it represents at least the beginning of the rectification of many of the past injustices which have been suffered by these our first people.

● (1530)

Another example of an inclusion in the Canadian Constitution which will better the lot of all Canadians is clause 6 which deals with mobility rights. This clause will allow Canadians to live and work in this country wherever they choose. It will allow Canadians to take advantage of opportunities to employ their skills, which may not exist in the province of their birth or residence. Perhaps on a non-economic level it may even have a more beneficial effect for Canadians, for such an amendment will provide the opportunity for Canadians from all parts of Canada to experience for themselves the differences that make this country.

I do, of course, understand the point which concerns our colleague, Senator Lucier, with respect to the problems which this clause may entail for disadvantaged regions or regions of this country where the cultural, economic and even ecological environment is fragile. I believe that there should be safeguards for areas which need them, such as the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. This provision smooths the way for affirmative action programs and is one aspect of the solution which must be used where possible. But, overall, if we are to be truly Canadian citizens we must have the right to be citizens of the part of this country we choose.

Clearly, the language provisions in the charter are a step forward and an improvement on the existing minority language provisions, and also on the position of both the French and English languages as official languages of this country. For the first time the French version of all constitutional documents will be prepared and will have equal authority with the English versions. Also, the entrenchment of minority language education rights is a provision which is long overdue. In an officially bilingual country, it is imperative that citizens of both language groups have the opportunity to be educated in their mother tongue.

I have already mentioned the inclusion of the rights of the handicapped in clause 15, and I must say that I welcome this amendment which will increase the standard and the quality of life of all those who suffer mental or physical disability. In his presentation on November 25, Mr. Ron Kanary, vice-chairman, Coalition of Provincial Organizations for the Handicapped, made a statement which sums up and articulates the purpose and intent of a charter:

> The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms will articulate the most basic and cherished values of our society and place them in the basic legislation of our land. This alone will set a new tone which of itself will do much to redress the injuries of exclusion and prejudice which have been our inheritance.

While Mr. Kanary was referring directly to the problems of the handicapped, it is a statement that could well apply to all those who are affected by any clause of the charter. Approximately one week before the committee rose, four people—two in wheelchairs and two with seeing-eye dogs—came into the room and waited at the back until the proceedings were over, at approximately 11.30 p.m. At that point they came forward and presented Serge Joyal and myself with "handicapped" pins. With tears in their eyes they thanked us and the other members of the committee for all that we had done. I shall wear that button on my lapel for as long as I live.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Hays: One cannot pick up a daily newspaper in Canada today without reading about somebody doing something for the handicapped. Usually it is something that has never been done before. Honourable senators are probably aware that six out of every hundred people are handicapped in some way. This ratio is equivalent to the ratio of people who attend university.

The entrenchment of the equalization principle in Part III, clause 34, is also for the better. While this is not a new principle, it is very important to the health of our federal system. The other day Senator Stanbury pointed out that the per capita income from all resources in Prince Edward Island in 1978-79 was $3, while the per capita income from all resources in Alberta was $1,874.

That is a big difference in revenue, and in the amount of money which a province has available to work with. In 1981-82 Prince Edward Island will receive $765 per capita in equalization payments, and even at that figure there will be a huge difference between the amount of money available to Prince Edward Island and that available to Alberta to provide services for their residents. In all, the federal government will redistribute $3,627.2 million in equalization transfer payments in 1981-82.

The enormity of the discrepancy between Alberta and Prince Edward Island has not always been so. It is not so very long since Alberta was a "have not" province which received equalization payments from the federal treasury. Few of us would have predicted 25 or 30 years ago the extent to which Alberta's wealth has grown. Few of us know what the situation in this country will be 100 years from now. How many of us would say with certainty which provinces will be "have" or "have not" even 25 years from now? It may be that Newfoundland will be in the position Alberta is in today, as opposed to being on the receiving end of equalization payments. But those equalization payments will have helped Newfoundland to attain that position, and their entrenchment in our new Constitution is of fundamental importance today and for our future.

There are other matters of equal importance, the inclusion of Part VII, clause 56, on resources will have played just as large a part, if not a larger part, in the future of all the provinces. When Mr. Blakeney—one of only four provincial premiers from whom the committee heard—appeared on December 19, he told us that in Saskatchewan:

> —resources provide more than a quarter of our provincial government revenues, which are used to finance a broad range of social and economic benefits for Saskatchewan residents. Resources represent our best hope of providing long-term stability and diversity, or ironing out the booms and busts of a very volatile economy. Resources are the key to Saskatchewan's prosperity.

If honourable senators would like the reference, I will provide it.

Of course, honourable senators, we all know that while the figures are a little different, the situation is the same in Alberta, British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec with regard to hydro power, and, perhaps soon, it will be the same in Newfoundland. Resources will not simply be the key to prosperity but will have opened the door to prosperity.

The amendment to the resolution which clarifies the provincial ownership and control of natural resources certainly puts the provinces in the best position they have ever been in to achieve prosperity. Mr. Grant Notley, Leader of the Alberta New Democratic Party, while presenting his party's brief before the committee, told us that in one year Alberta's revenue would increase by between $600 million and $700 million as a result of the amendment on indirect taxation, and the increase in revenue to other provinces would be substantial. Thus, the inclusion of the resource clause was not a minor matter, and it was accomplished, in part, because Mr. Blakeney took the time. He served the people of Saskatchewan well by appearing before the committee—and I remind honourable senators that some premiers did not appear.

As an aside, it is interesting to note that not one oil company even approached the committee, either by way of written submission or as a witness. Maybe they were afraid to come before the committee. Personally, I prefer, for various reasons, to believe that they did not see the need to come. I prefer to believe that they trusted the government and they liked the resource amendment.

The amending formula provided in the resolution is yet another example of how the people of Canada will be better off with the passage of this resolution by Westminster. We have heard the former Prime Minister, Joe Clark, say that this formula creates two classes of province, one with an absolute veto and one without. While it protects the culture of Quebec, it also takes into account a large proportion of the population of the province of Ontario. It also provides for the first time veto rights to the provinces. Presently no province has a veto over anything. I think it is important to remember that the formula provided in the resolution is an interim amending formula. If agreement can be reached within two years after patriation on a proposal for a different amending procedure, this formula will be put to the people in a referendum. The federal government has spent years negotiating an amending formula, but has been unable to get agreement. The provinces cannot agree among themselves. The situation cannot go on indefinitely. Canada cannot afford it; it cannot afford to be faced with divisive wrangling every time an amendment must be made to the Constitution to allow legislation to be passed, as in the case of the pension legislation, the unemployment insurance legislation and many other pieces of legislation.

As we are to bring our Constitution home to Canada, it is necessary to have an amending formula. This may not be the ideal formula, and as Mr. Chrétien has said:

● (1540)

> There are flaws in every aspect of it.

However, he went on to say:

> I do think there is a time in history where we have to take our responsibilities because when you want to please everybody you do not touch the problem—

Notwithstanding its imperfections, this formula, a modification of the Victoria formula, is the only one that has any claim whatsoever as one which the Prime Minister and all the provincial premiers of the day could agree upon. We need an amending formula, and this is the best that we, as Canadians, have yet drawn up.

You know, honourable senators, Canada has been without the power to amend her own Constitution since there has been a Canada. No other nation must work under this handicap. It is not only the Liberal government but the last two Conservative governments as well which have tried to reach an agreement with the provinces, and tried unsuccessfully. What are we, as Canadians, to do? The provincial premiers cannot agree among themselves on an amending formula, on a Charter of Rights, on court action, or even on a trip to England. To wait for any agreement among the provinces, let alone unanimity, will cause more delay in the patriation of the Constitution, and more frustration of the entrenchment of rights.

Honourable senators, we live in a federal state. The Parliament of Canada is the federal Parliament made up of members elected and appointed from across the country. The federal Parliament speaks for the people of Canada with as much legitimacy as the provincial governments. Should the federal institution place itself at the mercy of the provinces who wish to bargain with the rights of their residents for more power? Honourable senators, I say: no. Should the federal government let the idea of patriation die because there is not unanimous agreement? Again, honourable senators, I say: no.

It is often the case, in any endeavour, that if no one takes the initiative and tries to accomplish something, nothing gets done. Sometimes it takes someone with vision, someone with courage and determination, to accomplish things that others have not been able to. This was the case with Mr. Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights. He fought long and hard for it, and, I will admit, against opposition from members of my party both here and in the other place. This was also the case with Mr. Pearson's determination that Canada should have the best medicare system in the world, the best pension plan in the world, the closest possible to a free post-secondary education system, and a distinctive Canadian flag. The day he asked me to join his cabinet in 1963, Mr. Pearson told me that these were the dreams he had for Canada. These were the things that he wanted to accomplish for Canada as Prime Minister. He went a long way towards accomplishing them, against considerable opposition and against considerable odds and, I think, all Canadians are proud and grateful that he was able to do so.

Mr. Trudeau also has his vision of Canada. He also has something very important which he wants to accomplish for Canada—the patriation of the Constitution. Other prime ministers have made attempts at patriation, and earlier prime ministers have had other priorities. Mr. Trudeau's priority is patriation. He is the person with the courage and determination to accomplish his vision, just as Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Pearson did. Certainly, he has invested more time, and he certainly has put more effort than any other prime minister into trying to reach an agreement with the provinces on the Constitution.

Since 1867, a total of 78 days have been spent on constitutional discussion at federal-provincial first ministers' meetings. Mr. Laurier spent six days; Mr. Borden spent four days; Mr. King spent fifteen days; Mr. Bennett spent eight days; Mr. St. Laurent spent eleven days; Mr. Pearson spent eight days; and Mr. Trudeau spent twenty-six days—and this does not include federal-provincial meetings at the ministerial level.

Senator Smith: That is a day and a half a year.

Senator Hays: Well, that is one-third of the time that all the prime ministers, including Sir John A. Macdonald, spent on it. Mr. Trudeau has been accused of having an obsession with patriation of the Constitution. It is, I think an unfair accusation, because, honourable senators, if one is going to accuse Mr. Trudeau of having an obsession with patriation, one must equally accuse Sir John A. Macdonald of having had an obsession with Confederation.

Actually, one might well make comparisons between Mr. Trudeau and Sir John A. Macdonald. Sir John A. Macdonald faced a revolt by five of the seven provinces demanding better financial terms and wider revenue powers for the provinces, and Constitution changes limiting the powers of the dominion government. Even then, provinces were demanding Senate reform; they wanted to be able to appoint one half of the senators and to reduce the term of the appointment to four years. Sir John A. Macdonald, the leader of the Conservative government of the day, also met the provinces in the courts in defending federal powers and jurisdiction. He was also faced with the organized opposition of the provinces to national policies and national leadership of the federal Parliament.

Professor Lovell Clark, of the University of Manitoba, has written that if Sir John A. Macdonald had acceded to the demands of the premiers in 1887, Canada would have become a mere league of states—"if indeed it continued to exist." Professor Clark agrees with that eminent Canadian historian, Dr. Arthur Lower, and I agree with both of them, that Canadians must face up to the question of where the ultimate authority resides in this country—with Parliament or with the provinces.

Professor Clark wrote, and I paraphrase:

> If the latter prevail in their view that Canada is merely a loose union of ten provinces . . . then goodbye Canada.

He went on to say that if Prime Minister Trudeau can resolve the problem:

> No name will go down in history in greater honour than his.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: That's what he wants.

Senator Hays: This comparison of present-day conflicts with conflicts of the past is useful in another way as well. How many of us, honourable senators, remember Sir John A. Macdonald's court battles with the provinces? How many of us remember the debate on the change in the citizenship law in 1946 when Mr. T. L. Church, a member of the Conservative Party and of the loyal opposition in the other place, said of the bill, that it "invades the jurisdiction of the provinces"? He went on to say:

> This will be one of the most unfortunate measures ever brought before the House of Commons and will create more disunity in Canada than we have seen since Confederation.

Seventeen years ago many of the same arguments and charges used about the divisiveness of the resolution before us were made in another debate. Mr. Diefenbaker, during the flag debate, said:

> You cannot force a flag on the people of Canada and secure from them that mystic something which some ridicule as nationalism . . . The patriotism of men and women who love their country. A flag design is not a trick by which one group imposes upon others some evidence of Canadianism that all will not accept.

I am aware that Mr. Clark has ridiculed comparisons of our present dilemma with the flag debate. In the other place on Monday, February 13 he said:

> We are not discussing here a symbol to be seen but an institution to be used.

He went on to say that the aftermath of the patriation of the Constitution with this resolution.

> —will have us looking around to the breaking up of the Confederation and perhaps the breaking up of the nation itself.

I think that Mr. Clark has ignored the depth of feeling that surrounded the flag debate. More than this, honourable senators, I put it to you that, while the adoption of this resolution is not a guarantee of agreement and unity, it is also not the divisive tool that Mr. Clark has stated it to be. The provinces are not victims. Even a member of Mr. Clark's own party, Mr. George Hees, has realized that the division between the federal government and the provinces is, in very large part, the fault of the provinces. In an interview with the Globe and Mail, Mr. Hees said:

> I've given up completely on the provinces. They are just horse traders for oil and fish . . . The people are represented perfectly in this Parliament. This is where it all comes together.

This may be a little strong—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Hays: —but it is good to know that at least some members of the opposition have accepted that the federal government is not the villain Mr. Clark sets it up to be.

Agreement on the amendment of the British North America Act has been the goal of many prime ministers. It has eluded a few and frustrated many, and Mr. Clark is one of them.

• (1550)

In the same year as the debate on the adoption of a new Canadian flag, there was debate on the amendment of the British North America Act to allow passage of pension legislation. Mr. Diefenbaker outlined a situation in the country in 1964 which was very similar to that which we find ourselves in today. He lamented that the Conservative administration had not been able to reach an agreement with the provinces to patriate the British North America Act because of the inability to agree on an amending formula. His government was unable to get an agreement to the amendment of section 94 of the B.N.A. Act that would allow the federal pension legislation to be passed. There were two conferences of attorneys general, in 1960 and 1961, on patriation of the Constitution, and many discussions went on during that time between federal and provincial officials. Mr. Diefenbaker was not able to get agreement, and he deplored the situation. In a speech on June 18, 1964, he said:

> It is ironical that we, because of the failure of our governments federally and provincially to arrive at an agreement, still have provisions that are not applicable to any other independent nation within the Commonwealth. Whatever the views of the past may have been, certainly there has been no justification for this during the last 40 years.

In the same speech he went on to explain the reasons why the problem has existed in Canada since the beginning, and why it is that we do not yet have a Constitution for Canada in Canada.

> We have to go to Westminster and say, "Will you please allow us to amend our Constitution?" Not because this is what Westminster wants, but because there is not in this country of Canada that oneness, that determination of Canadians whatever their province, to join together as one nation to make this a great nation.—

Senator Flynn: Is there that determination today?

Senator Hays: He continued:

> No nation can achieve greatness when there are divisions within it which deny the right of the Parliament of one's country to deal with one's own Constitution.

Mr. Diefenbaker was a wise man; he understood. Honourable senators opposite also understand. They had a chance to work out a solution to the constitutional dilemma, and they failed, both in 1960-1961 and in 1979-1980. As Mr. Diefenbaker said, no nation can achieve greatness when Parliament's right to deal with the Constitution is denied. I believe that this situation must be resolved as quickly as possible, and the Constitution brought home to Canada with the passage of this resolution.

As Mr. Broadbent said last week in the other place, the serious question about divisiveness is not in the short run but in the long run. He pointed out that at the time when this country was created, the very action of creating Canada was divisive, but today, despite our differences, we are all proud to be Canadians. In my opinion, the patriation of the Constitution will not be divisive in the long run. I agree with Mr. Broadbent, when he said:

> We live in one of the most difficult nations in the world to govern, one of the most regionally and culturally diverse in existence, but we are rich in natural resources and human potential. We must now use this new Constitution we are acquiring as the beginning step of a new spirit of nation building which will lead to the creation of one of the most just and exciting nations on the face of the earth. We know we can do that.

Honourable senators, this resolution is not perfect. There are, indeed, changes which I would like to see made when Canada's Constitution is patriated. I would like to see clear guidelines on the "where numbers warrant" provision in the clause on minority language education rights so that those rights will be more equally accessible to residents of all provinces. I also feel strongly that the property rights issue should be entrenched.

I certainly agree that there should be restrictions on foreign ownership of Canadian land, but I do believe that Canadians, both individuals and corporations, should have the right to own land anywhere in Canada. As a farmer, I am well aware of the concerns which the provinces have expressed, on control over land use and zoning. Therefore, I do agree that there should be limitations to property rights, but I believe that Canadians should be allowed to own property wherever they choose in this country. Canada was founded by people who came here so that they could own land and develop it. In some cases their heirs and successors find themselves forced to move from province to province to seek employment, and they should not as a result, be deprived of their inheritance, as many are now, because of provincial restrictions. The concept of property ownership is fundamental to the Canadian way of life, and I will certainly promote the amendment of the economic rights clause in the Constitution after patriation.

On October 6 the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution met for the first time to consider the resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada. After 56 days and 106 meetings, with 131 elected members of Parliament and 51 senators having taken part and having heard submissions from 104 witnesses, and having taken into account all the submissions made to the committee—a total of 1,262—I believe that the resolution before us now is better than that which the committee started with.

You know, honourable senators, for just about anything to work well in this world people have to be guided by rules. There have to be rules in the school house; there have to be rules of the road. There even have to be rules in this chamber, or senators might not accomplish anything at all.

In effect, a constitution is a compilation of rules for a country. The resolution before us now, which I hope will soon become a major part of the Canadian Constitution, is an improved set of rules for Canada. It is new and it is modern. It takes into account the changes in attitude that this country has experienced over the last 114 years. It has occurred to me, honourable senators, that it may in fact be the most modern Constitution in the world. The witnesses who appeared before the committee represented a very wide range of Canadians; probably the whole 24 million were represented.

Honourable senators, when the resolution is passed by Westminster, as I sincerely hope it will be, there will probably have been more people involved and taken account of in the writing of the Canadian Constitution than have been involved in the writing of any other country's constitution in the past.

I am, therefore, expressing my support for the resolution, for the leader of my party, the Prime Minister, and the Government of Canada in their determination for Canadians to have a constitution made in Canada.

Forty-two years ago this August, I was travelling with 12 carloads of cattle, with about 35 head in each car, and they were destined for Scotland. I rode with those cattle in the boxcar. We had a man for every other car to take care of them. On top of that train there were 500 people travelling across Canada, with no homes and with nothing to eat. That is the way it had been since 1935. I made as many as 13 trips down to Halifax and Montreal in one year. I know a little about hardships. I saw those fellows taking tomato cans and cooking up roots and making soup. In August of 1939 the first gun was fired, and those guys all climbed down off the boxcars and fought for a country that had not been too good to them. That is exactly what they did.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Hays: One fellow from Brandon called Smokey crawled into my car. Later, he wrote to me, but that lad did not come back. At that time we did not have medicare; we did not have unemployment insurance; we did not have old age pensions; we did not have free education at the university level—we did not have any of those things. This is something new, modern and good, and it is something that everybody should support.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-54—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow rose, pursuant to notice of Monday, March 2, 1981:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject-matter of the Bill C-54, intituled: "An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax," tabled in the Senate on 2nd March, 1981.

He said: Honourable senators, as Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, I gave notice on Monday, March 2 that I would make some brief remarks on the report on the pre-study of Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax. At that time the report was appended to the Debates of the Senate. As you know, the bill was reported without amendment.

[Senator Hays.]

• (1600)

The bill contained many amendments to the Income Tax Act and related acts. Some of the amendments are relieving, some are restrictive and some are technical.

The bill reflected some recommendations made by the committee in 1976 and 1979.

The bill reflected recommendations made by the committee and undertakings given by Finance Minister Crosbie on December 5, 1979 respecting term preferred shares and income bonds.

The bill proposed, under clause 106, that ownership certificates need no longer contain social insurance numbers, and I believe that Senator Smith made an impassioned address in the house on that matter.

The balance of the report dealt with some specific issues contained in the bill which were of particular interest to the committee. These issues included the overseas employment exemption. In order to render Canadian firms more competitive on the international markets, the bill proposed an exemption of up to $50,000 in respect of income earned by Canadian employees if employed overseas for more than six consecutive months.

The committee was concerned that the purpose of this exemption would be frustrated to a degree if employers were required to make deductions at source. Officials from Revenue Canada have advised that it will be their policy to grant relief from deductions at source upon application of the "undue hardship" rules.

Regarding supplies inventory and prepaid expenses, clause 3 of the bill required taxpayers to include inventory items which were formerly considered normal business expenses in the year incurred. These items are advertising or packaging material, parts and supplies. Their value for computing the amount of the inventory must not be less than the lesser of cost and replacement cost. The committee was concerned that this may require a large number of taxpayers to maintain inventory records for minor office supplies, which would be too burdensome for many taxpayers.

Officials of the Department of National Revenue have stated that it will be their policy not to go beyond generally accepted accounting principles, and they will only insist that such items be included in inventory where the amounts are significant in relation to a taxpayer's business as a whole.

Regarding unregistered employee benefit plans, the bill, by the provisions of clause 4, removed the unintended tax advantage arising out of certain unregistered employee benefit plans. Payments made after December 11, 1979 by an employer to an unregistered plan will not be deductible until the amounts vest irrevocably in the employee. At that time they will be taxed in the hands of the employee.

With regard to small business development bonds, these bonds have been proposed as a measure to reduce the costs incurred by small business corporations while interest rates are high. The temporary measure is designed to reduce the interest cost to qualifying small business corporations by enabling them to obtain after-tax financing.

To qualify, the bonds must be issued after December 11, 1979 and before January 1, 1982; they must have a principal amount of between $10,000 and $500,000 and a term of between one and five years; the borrower and lender must make a joint election; the borrower must be a Canadian-controlled private corporation qualifying for the small business deduction, and substantially all of its assets must be used in active business in Canada; the borrower must be in financial difficulty or the proceeds used to acquire land, certain depreciable property or to finance scientific research.

Regarding lease option arrangements, subclause 5(2) of the bill proposed an amendment to make sure that when taxpayers have been able to deduct rental payments and subsequently acquire the rented property upon exercise of an option to purchase the property, any difference between the option price and fair market value will be "recaptured" and subject to tax. Heretofore most taxpayers were only subject to tax on one half of the difference.

With reference to capital gains strips, clause 24 was added to the bill to prevent corporations from avoiding what would otherwise be capital gains subject to tax by converting such gains into tax-free inter-corporate dividends.

The report outlines the principal features of these provisions and makes reference to the printed proceedings of the committee for technical clarifications given by officials of the Department of Finance.

On resource properties of non-residents, the bill, under clause 62, will prevent certain non-residents—for example, U.S. residents—selling resource property in Canada without paying Canadian tax.

Regarding garnishment, the committee has discussed with officials of the Department of Finance and of the Department of National Revenue certain difficulties some financial institutions may have in protecting their rights and resources should they be called upon to comply with the provisions of clause 103 of the bill.

The officials have undertaken to consider the matter further and to introduce appropriate amendments with retroactive effect should circumstances so warrant. Pending introduction of such amendments, banks may have to make contractual arrangements with certain of their customers to protect their interests.

I mention these matters because it is important to the public, and particularly to tax practitioners, to know that the provisions of the bill have been given careful scrutiny by your committee.

Senator Flynn: I move the adjournment of the debate because Senator Roblin may wish to make some comments. He may feel that it is not necessary, but, just in case, I move the adjournment.

On motion of Senator Flynn, for Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, March, 5, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Renaude Lapointe, P.C., Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

THE HONOURABLE LIONEL CHOQUETTE

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT FROM SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am terribly sorry that because of his health condition Senator Lionel Choquette is unable to be with us today, for tomorrow he will be reaching the age of retirement, the kind of retirement he has chosen.

I had talks with him about it and I know he now feels different about it.

On one hand, as any Canadian worthy of the name—Senator Giguère will understand—he is attracted by the sound of the waves and the sandy beaches of Florida or the West Indies, in his case it is the island of St. Lucia where he owns a small property. On the other hand, after sitting in this Chamber for 22 years and observing the glibness and the gift of gab of the Liberal majority, he can only regret having to part with such expert debaters as Senators Perrault and Olson.

However, we have promised to send him the Senate Hansard so that he will be able to enjoy the evasive answers of Senator Olson and the irrelevant flights of oratory of Senator Perrault.

Lionel Choquette is a dear friend of mine. We have always gotten along very well together, perhaps because he did not take himself too seriously and readily laughed at himself, thinking that he would be stupid to be the only one not to do so.

Lionel Choquette has had an outstanding career here. He was appointed in 1959 and in 1962 he became the deputy of government leader Senator Alf Brooks. When the latter became opposition leader in 1963, Senator Choquette filled the position of deputy opposition leader and acted in that capacity until I was called upon to succeed Senator Brooks in 1967; this goes far back, it was a long time ago. He held that position until 1974 and gave me extremely loyal and effective support. I owe him a lot.

Our colleague is a lawyer and as such he was very successful and has always enjoyed an excellent reputation among his Ontario colleagues.

A distinguished defence lawyer and speaker—the Senate did witness that on many occasions—in private life Lionel Choquette is a fascinating story teller, a specialist of good jokes and especially plays on words, but at times a poet as well. He likes to recite Lamartine and Shakespeare. His word for word declamation of Alphonse Daudet's La dernière classe was always a great success. Recalling that text gives a certain melancholic appropriateness to this occasion.

I have known very few people who, like him, were equally at ease in either of our two official languages. Choquette is the true prototype of a bilingual and bicultural man.

Upon the retirement of our colleague and friend the Senate loses a member who served it well. Honourable senators are losing a most pleasant companion. We will miss him. Still, I do hope we will have many opportunities to see him again.

As we wish him a speedy recovery we express the hope that he will be able to enjoy fully the moments of leisure he will have in his retirement.

[English]

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I imagine that I have known Lionel Choquette longer than anyone else in this chamber. We were students at the University of Ottawa at the same time. He graduated in 1928; I graduated in 1927. We took many of our courses together, particularly in the later years of our stay there.

He was very active on the campus. He was a good student and a good athlete—in those days he was much thinner than he is today. He played hockey, football and tennis. Both of us were born in an area in Ottawa known as Sandy Hill, and as young fellows we spent a great deal of our time on a playing field which, in those days, was known as Varsity Oval. That was long before we ever went to the university.

At the university, Lionel Choquette was a great debater. He belonged to the French debating society and was one of their leaders. He was also a skilled actor and he, like his older brother, Falconio, was a star in the college dramatic society. Both spoke English with an Irish accent. Senator Flynn spoke of him as being the ideal bilingual Canadian. That is very true, because his French was impeccable, as was his English, which he spoke without a French accent. I believe it was because he was brought up with Irish people, as I was, that our way of speaking became his way.

Senator Flynn has said that he was a brilliant lawyer. He spent 48 years at the bar. At one stage he was President of the County of Carleton Law Association, a local association of lawyers, as I had been, so our careers were running in parallel for quite a while. Then he became the President of the Progressive Conservative Association of Ottawa East, and we parted company!

Lionel Choquette has been in the Senate for over 23 years. Senator Flynn has said that he was deputy leader on both the government and opposition sides. I shall always be grateful for the co-operation he gave me when he was Deputy Leader of the Opposition and I had the responsibility on this side. I am sure that that co-operation, because of our old friendship, came very easily to him. I am also grateful for the favours and the help he gave me in those years when, for some reason or another, either Senator Brooks or Senator Flynn was absent.

Lionel Choquette showed great capacity for the work of this chamber. He occupied the Chair on a number of occasions with great credit to himself and to the house. He had a great capacity also for friendship, which probably was born out of the trait that Senator Flynn has mentioned, namely, his great sense of humour and the fact that he would not take himself too seriously.

I have been distressed of late to know that his health has been anything but good, but I hope that in his retirement it will improve and that he will enjoy a long and happy retirement.

[Translation]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to associate myself with the sentiments expressed by Senators Flynn and Connolly. Senator Choquette has contributed continuously to this institution for over 23 years and I know that all senators on both sides of the house are grateful to him.

[English]

I conclude by wishing Senator Choquette every happiness in his retirement, which all of us hope he will enjoy with his wife, his children and his grandchildren.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, with your permission, I would also like to pay homage to Senator Choquette who was my neighbour and friend in this house for many years. After my appointment to the Senate, he gave me the benefit of his experience teaching me important procedural points so that through my interventions I might better serve the Senate.

Senator Choquette has been a noted defender of the cause of Ontario francophones in this house, as well as a promoter of the French language in that province.

As Senator Flynn and Senator Connolly indicated, he has had a busy legal practice. This was not always easy as we know that in the thirties it was not always easy for a French Canadian to make his mark in Ontario. However, he succeeded in being recognized as one of the great defence lawyers.

He raised many children to whom he gave a solid education and training, for which he must be given credit. As was already mentioned, Senator Choquette is a very witty man. He is also an excellent storyteller who could never manage to be boring.

I am sorry to know that his health has been anything but good as a result of a recent illness, but the best thing that he could do to get better quickly is to place himself in the care of his private nurse, his wife Marcelle, who has done everything in her power to give him tender loving care.

We hope that Senator Choquette will visit this house often, but even if he leaves Canada for the southern islands to enjoy a real retirement, as we have been told, we shall forgive him and remember him as a senator who always kept smiling in spite of the hardships life brings to all of us because he had a lot of confidence in the future.

• (1410)

[English]

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I should like to join with my colleagues in this expression of appreciation to Senator Choquette on the occasion of his retirement. I have one regret, and that is that Senator Walker is not here today to participate. Senator Walker, Senator Choquette and I were classmates at law school, and I can assure you that with Senator Choquette's great ability as an orator, mixed with his delightful sense of humour and his considerable skill in presenting that humour in his remarks, Senator Walker and I came a poor second on all such occasions when discussions among law students took the form of speeches.

The three of us have been through the long period since those law school days together, as practising lawyers and as solicitors. I could never convince the other two as to the correct political position to take in public affairs. Throughout the years they persisted in supporting the Conservative Party, and I could never make them see the error of their ways in that respect.

It is interesting to note that Senator Choquette was the first of the three of us to engage in active politics, which he did when he became the candidate for Ottawa East for the Conservative Party some five years before I became a candidate for the Liberal Party and several years—I am not sure how many—before Senator Walker became a candidate for the Conservative Party.

All that aside, Senator Choquette did bring considerable delight to the law students of the day—at a time when Osgoode Hall in Toronto was the only law school in existence in the province. As I have sat across from him in this chamber, listening to him speak on occasion, I have often wondered what influence he had on his fellow law students from across the province some 50 years ago. I suspect it was a very great one, because they always ask about him when I am talking with them. I could perhaps say more, as I am sure Senator Walker would were he here, but I do not think that would be wise or discreet. I merely conclude my remarks by wishing Senator Choquette a speedy recovery and a happy, long retirement in his favourite haunts.

• (1415)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to take a moment, as a relative "new boy," to say something about Senator Choquette. I did not know Senator Choquette until I came here, but I did know his reputation as a lawyer who was effective and learned in the law, and who, in spite of his acknowledged abilities, never took himself too seriously.

Senator Choquette had universal respect in the legal profession but always with "no side to him." His well deserved reputation as a lawyer, as a politician, as a Canadian and as a friend can perhaps best be summed up by a French word which, to some extent, describes him physically—solide.

PRIVILEGE

HON. GEORGE VAN ROGGEN—HOUSE OF COMMONS PROTECTIVE SERVICE—TREATMENT OF VISITOR TO PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. Today I had occasion to have lunch with Mr. Stephen Rogers, the Minister of the Environment for the Province of British Columbia, who joined Dr. McGeer, the Minister of Science and Technology from that province, and the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Mr. Rogers told us of an extraordinary experience of his. He had not been to Ottawa before. And as he came to the centre door of the Centre Block and entered on the main level, he approached the security officers at the desk and announced that he had an appointment with Senator Perrault. He was told, "Well, you can't come in here!" They did not even have the courtesy to indicate where he should go, other than to allow him to stumble back out the door—and I am glad it was not 40 below and snowing. Another security officer was kind enough to show him the Senate entrance. He then found his way to that entrance, where he was admitted.

I hope, Madam Speaker, that you will raise with the Speaker of the other place this incredible impertinence. I am sure that this is not something that would be perpetrated by all the security guards on the Hill. However, the fact that even one or two of them could be so ill-trained and uncivil as to treat any Canadian, let alone a cabinet minister of one of our provinces, in this fashion is distressing and should be stopped.

[Translation]

HON. JACQUES FLYNN, P.C. –STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS IN HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am also rising on a question of privilege, but of another kind.

Yesterday, in the House of Commons, the Leader of the Official Opposition put a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General, Mr. André Ouellet, with regard to the decision of the Director of Combines to refer the matter of the oil companies to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, and asked him whether or not he had consulted other members of the cabinet or even parliamentary secretaries before reaching his decision. Mr. Ouellet answered as follows, and I quote:

> I am happy to be asked this question. I was expecting it. I am glad to say that the government has not followed the bad example of the previous government. We did not consult other departments or ministers before deciding to proceed with the decision of the director. In other words, we did not consult other colleagues on the course of action taken. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was not consulted, as the previous government had wrongly done when it consulted the Minister of Transport.

Obviously, Mr. Ouellet was referring to the debate we had last year, and in which Senator Frith was involved, with regard to the consultation I had had with other ministers concerning Mr. Bertrand's request that charges be laid against certain western trucking companies.

I thought we had settled the matter by concluding that the minister, the Attorney General of Canada, not only has the right but the duty to consult other ministers if he deems it appropriate and if circumstances indicate he should.

When Mr. Ouellet says that, I merely ask him to confirm that it is no longer the opinion of the Minister of Justice today—an opinion which I complied with last year in the circumstances mentioned. I simply want to say to Mr. Ouellet that it is certainly not up to him, who has been found guilty of contempt of court, to lecture me in that regard.

PRESENTATION OF NATIONAL FARMERS UNION RE CROWSNEST PASS—REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. G. I. Smith, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, tabled the following report:

Thursday, March 5, 1981

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications was authorized by the Senate, as recorded in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of February 26, 1981 "in response to a request from the National Farmers Union to receive a presentation from representatives of that Union with respect to certain issues relating to the Crowsnest Pass."

Your Committee now reports that on Tuesday, March 3, 1981, it received a large delegation from the National Farmers Union led by Mr. Ted Strain, President, Mrs. Darlene Henderson, Women's President, Mr. Wayne Easter, Vice President and Mr. Stuart Thiesson, Executive Secretary.

The main thrust of the delegation's submission to your Committee was a strong plea for the retention of the Crow rate on the transport of grain.

To this end the National Farmers Union made three specific recommendations:—

(1) That the Federal government commit itself to the existing Crow rate structure in perpetuity.

(2) That in order to relieve the burden of discriminatory freight rates assessed against processed agricultural products and the livestock industry in the regions affected by the Crow rate, freight rates be adjusted in order to make such products competitive with the outward movement of grain and oilseeds under the Crow rate.

(3) That the Federal government regard rail transportation as an instrument for national and regional development and that it accordingly adopt a policy for total nationalization of the Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Ltd. and its subsidiaries. The integration and rationalization of those rail systems would permit them to be owned and operated as a public utility thereby assuring that national and regional economic social and development goals supersede the profit earning objectives of the companies.

The concluding paragraph of the Union's written brief reads as follows:—

114. We fully recognize the magnitude of this recommendation. However, the nation is less well served by continuing to invest huge volumes of financing in the rail transportation system without even the benefit of acquiring comparable equity, particularly in Canadian Pacific Ltd.

A complete transcript of the delegation's verbal presentation is recorded in the Proceedings of the Committee for March 3, 1981.

Your Committee was impressed by the representations made to it and recommends careful study of the submission of the National Farmers Union on the subject of retaining the Crow rate on grain.

Respectfully submitted,

George I. Smith
Chairman

THE ESTIMATES

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1981.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, March 10, 1981, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

● (1425)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators will remember that yesterday I explained that we are still working out a schedule for debating and disposing of the Constitution resolution. Those negotiations are ongoing. I believe we are very close to deciding upon what I hope all will agree is a sensible schedule.

Under the circumstances, it may be that honourable senators will be asked to sit four days next week, but that is unlikely. I believe we will only be sitting three days next week.

Three, and possibly four, days next week would naturally take us to Tuesday. I am asking for a sitting at 3 o'clock in the afternoon because the President of the United States will be here and arrangements are in place to receive him socially that evening. For that reason we felt it worthwhile to sit in the afternoon as an exception to our normal schedule.

The reason for sitting at 3 o'clock instead of 2 o'clock is that the Leader of the Opposition, in discussing the schedule for Tuesday afternoon, wisely suggested it was more convenient for a number of senators to get here at 3 o'clock because of travel schedules.

Honourable senators, I hope I have explained the reasons for our next sitting being at 3 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon.

That leaves the question of committee meetings which, as honourable senators know, we try to hold on Tuesday afternoons. Senator Lafond—who has undertaken to help monitor and quarterback our committee meetings—is aware of the sitting of the house at 3 o'clock in the afternoon on Tuesday next. He has made me aware of the fact that a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications is scheduled for 4.30 that afternoon. It would be a rather difficult matter to reschedule that meeting, so we should give Senator Smith's committee leave to sit while the Senate is sitting that afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Tuesday, March 10, 1981, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

OIL COMPANY PRICING PRACTICES—INQUIRY BY RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES COMMISSION

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and it has to do with the matter which the Director of Combines Investigation Branch of the Consumer and Corporate Affairs Department has just brought before the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission.

In the house yesterday, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, explaining the decision, said that the director had the following courses of action, the first being to report that he had terminated his inquiry and that there was no reason to pursue it; the second being—and I quote the minister:

> —to refer his findings to the Department of Justice, and ask it to lay charges based on the evidence that he has gathered during the inquiry.

[Senator Frith.]

• (1430)

The minister was interrupted and was asked, "Was that done"? The Honourable André Ouellet replied that the director has not followed that course.

Since I was the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General of Canada at that time, and would, therefore, know whether the director had asked the Department of Justice to inquire into and report on this matter, and since the department has appointed counsel to look into the matter, would the Leader of the Government ask the Minister of Justice to confirm that counsel has been appointed and that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was in error when he stated that this was not the course followed by the director? Would the leader also ask the Minister of Justice if he has received a report from counsel which is in accordance with this report that the director has decided to refer the matter to the tribunal?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition has posed an important question. It will be taken as notice, and his inquiries will be directed to the proper source.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in connection with the famous Garrison Dam problem. It is one of those matters which never seem to be resolved—certainly not in a way I like. We are informed that on December 1 last, the United States government sent a note to the federal administration in Canada proposing a meeting to consult on the matter, which, I believe, was to begin on March 2. My question is: Did the Government of Canada receive such an invitation; and, if so, was it answered and is a meeting in prospect?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have a complete reply for the honourable senator, but a reply will certainly be sought. However, I do have a statement on the subject of the Garrison project which was issued today.

The government is disturbed by reports that the United States Government is proposing an additional appropriation of $4 million for the Garrison project.

Canada has consistently held the position and made it clear to the United States that the Garrison project, as currently designed and authorized, contains features which, if constructed, would lead to violation of the 1909 Boundary Waters Treaty. In this opinion we are supported by the findings of the International Joint Commission.

We have further made clear our concern that any new funding appears to be leading inexorably towards completion of the authorized project.

The Prime Minister intends to raise the Garrison issue with President Reagan. My colleague, the Minister of the Environment, will be doing likewise when he meets with the United States Secretary of the Interior in the near future.

We intend to seek from the United States government immediate formal clarification of current and planned allocations and expenditures on the Garrison project.

I reiterate that the additional information sought by Senator Roblin will be produced as quickly as possible.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I would point out to the Leader of the Government that in his reply to a question of mine on February 12 last he stated that the funds about which we are talking would not involve work that affects Canada. Now we are informed that this is not the case with respect to the $4 million in new funds which are now being allocated for this project. In fact, we find Canadian officials being quoted as saying that none of the parts of the project on which they are working will be worth a damn without the Manitoba components. In case there is any doubt, that word is spelled d-a-m-n.

Senator Frith: Coming from you, we had no doubt.

Senator Roblin: That word does not express my feelings on the subject; I would like to use something a little stronger. We find that the United States officials are now saying that they have reached the point where any new funding for Garrison would have to be spent on a part which is directly linked to Manitoba. My concern is that events have overtaken, if they have not outstripped, the negotiations. We keep asking for meetings or to be invited to meetings which, apparently, we have not attended up to the present time, but things keep going ahead as if our input was not reaching the right quarter down there. I mention this because, while I know that there are many things to be discussed during the coming visit to Canada of the President of the United States, I hope this matter will not be sloughed off.

● (1440)

I am disturbed to read newspaper reports—but, after all, they are only newspaper reports—to the effect that this is a ceremonial occasion rather than a working one and it is unlikely that much of a concrete nature will be accomplished.

Can the minister tell me that he will undertake to give us as detailed a report as he can about the Garrison discussions after the meeting is over? If no satisfactory conclusion has been reached, I would then ask the government what they intend to do to invoke the treaty on which this is all founded in order to bring this matter to a conclusion or, at least, to a tribunal or forum where the matter can be effectively resolved, and thus avoid this continuous process whereby the United States government appears to be nibbling away at this thing, regardless of anything we say, and will, undoubtedly in the not too distant future, it seems to me, confront us with a fait accompli.

Senator Perrault: Senator Roblin's concerns can be well understood. I can only provide, I hope, some degree of reassurance that the Garrison issue will be on the agenda of the proposed meetings between the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and the President of the United States. The government regards it as a most serious issue, and hopefully, a report can be provided for the Senate after those discussions have taken place. There is no question whatsoever that there are some very troubling aspects to this whole matter of the Garrison.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: I have a supplementary question. The urgent question that I asked my leader about 10 days ago contained the facts mentioned by Senator Roblin, and the leader was going to look into it. Is there any possibility that we may hear about that matter even before representations are made to the President of the United States when he is here next week? I know that it is on the agenda, and I hope that the discussions will be successful. Since I posed my question on this matter, has the Leader of the Government had an opportunity to receive the report in regard to the activities that have taken place sor far?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the information I have was received only this afternoon from the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Certainly, priority attention will be accorded the issue, and if certain supplementary material can be produced next Tuesday afternoon, we shall do so. I understand the great concern of Senator Guay and Senator Roblin, particularly, but this is a matter of concern to all Canadians wherever they live, and it should occupy an important place on any agenda of talks between Canada and the United States.

Senator Roblin: I have a supplementary point, honourable senators, that concerns me. Why does it appear that we have not responded to the December 1, 1980 invitation of the United States government to meet with them? This is particularly worrisome in view of the fact that I believe they invited us to meet on March 2. Did we get an invitation? What happened?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will provide as much information as it is possible to amass at this time. Hopefully, that information can be brought to the chamber, as I say, early next week. I have given all the information that is currently available.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

FUNDING BY PRIVATE SECTOR

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The Minister of Agriculture has announced that the Farm Credit Corporation plans to raise some of its increased funding, as the Farm Credit Corporation finds it necessary, from the private sector. Other crown corporations, such as Petro-Canada and its subsidiary Petro-Canada International and Atomic Energy of Canada, are not required to raise their funding in the private sector. My question is: Why is it necessary for the Farm Credit Corporation to turn to the private sector for funding when other crown corporations are not required to follow the same pattern?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, few Canadians have demonstrated such expert knowledge and interest in the problems of the farming community in this country as our distinguished colleague, the Honourable Hazen Argue, and I would ask him to provide the information to the honourable senator, if it is available.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I do not know that I can provide the information. I am not well acquainted at this moment with what action, if any, the Farm Credit Corporation has taken to raise private money. I am not aware that it has, but I do not tell the honourable senator that it has not.

The Farm Credit Corporation does such useful work in making money available to many smaller and younger farmers, and those farmers who do not have access to bank credit or private credit, that I think real consideration is being given to providing additional funds through what one might term the traditional method for the crown corporation, but I am not able to say what the conclusion may be. I will have to take the honourable senator's question as notice, if he wants a more definitive and accurate answer on raising money in the private sector. The honourable senator may know the answer to the question himself.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, perhaps I know a good deal more about the question than either the Leader of the Government or Senator Argue, but I appreciate very much his offer to obtain further information on it. The announcement was made to one of the farm groups who were visiting in Ottawa last week. I rather expected that the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board would be present at those meetings, but obviously he was not. If he would inquire from his colleague and determine—

Senator Argue: Which meeting are you referring to?

Senator Phillips: The National Farmers Union.

Senator Perrault: He hosted it.

Senator Phillips: That is why he did not hear the Minister of Agriculture then. If he would inquire and determine the amount of funds that are required by the department, the percentage to be raised by the private sector, and the amount of interest to be charged on the funds raised from the private sector, I would appreciate that very much.

● (1450)

Senator Argue: I will be happy to try to obtain that information for the honourable senator. I did meet with the National Farmers Union, if that is the organization to which my honourable friend refers. I do not think I can be accused of meeting with too few farm organizations, but one cannot meet with all of them at a given time. I have been accused at times of meeting with one too many, and of perhaps having said some things which, in the view of some people, should not have been said, but I do not think that I can be faulted for not attending a large number of meetings with farm organizations. If I should receive an invitation some day to visit my honourable friend's province to speak to some farm organization that he may have in mind, I shall be happy to accept it.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I should like to point out that I am not one of those who accused Senator Argue of meeting with too many farm organizations. I am not concerned about that, and I do not think he should be either. The only thing he should be concerned with is the fact that perhaps the farm organizations complain about not meeting with him. If he follows that pattern, I will give him credit.

[Senator Perrault.]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

IRAN—RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Following the release from Iran of the American hostages last January, there was speculation in the press that the Canadian government was considering the re-establishment of diplomatic relations with Iran and the lifting of sanctions. Could the Leader of the Government inform the Senate as to whether any further consideration has been given to that subject?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, some information on that subject has been made available. The lifting of sanctions follows similar action by other sanctions-applying countries, including the United States of America. It has been taken in conformity with international law and practice, and in no way signifies Canadian approval of Iranian actions past or present. It is also a question that is quite apart from the reactivation of our embassy in Tehran, on which we are proceeding more deliberately.

Honourable senators, I have some late information which was received only an hour or so ago regarding trade with Iran. In 1980 Canada exported $41.3 million of goods to Iran compared with $22.4 million in 1979. Wheat worth $29.9 million was by far the largest element in that trade. Flour worth $1.3 million and pharmaceuticals worth approximately $3 million were other major items. Wheat and pharmaceuticals were among those items which were specifically exempted from sanctions at the time the export embargo was announced on May 22, 1980.

No country imposing sanctions, including the United States, placed an official embargo on the shipment to Iran of humanitarian items such as food and medicine. The remainder of the $41.3 million consisted of goods exempted from sanction or shipped before permits were required by the imposition of our export embargo.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT OF NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked by Senator Murray on January 21 concerning the effect of the National Energy Program.

Having reviewed the November 1980 issue of Data Resources of Canada's "Canadian Review", may I reiterate what I said when I initially replied to this question on January 21, and that is that I do not share the conclusions of their report on the budget, energy policy, and the economy. The National Energy Program, since it was originally announced in late October, has not been without its critics, for it is a very courageous program aimed at energy security, fairness and opportunity—very clear-cut goals that will benefit all Canadians.

With specific reference to the figures quoted by my honourable colleague in his question, I would like to inform him that we have been unable to verify from Data Resources of Canada sources the estimate of $4.5 billion which he referred to as being NEP-related revenues for 1981. Insofar as direct expenditures arising from the NEP are concerned, they will be well in excess of $2 billion in that year. This amount is additional to the federal government's ongoing expenditures related to the energy activities of Energy, Mines and Resources, the National Energy Board, Atomic Energy Control Board, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, Petro-Canada, the Northern Pipeline Agency, and the major conservation programs, including the Canadian Home Insulation Program. I would like to refer my honourable colleague to page 90 of the NEP, which will provide him with a comprehensive listing of the government's energy expenditures for the years 1980-83.

It can be certified that essentially all of the revenues arising from the implementation of the NEP will be re-invested in energy-related activities designed to achieve the objectives set out in the NEP.

ENERGY

OIL—IMPORTATION FROM MEXICO

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked by Senator Murray on February 18 concerning the importation of oil from Mexico, together with an analysis of many of the prices paid for various crude oil. It is a lengthy answer, but it may not be complete in the view of Senator Murray.

As I have indicated previously, Mexico has been forced to reduce crude oil exports to all purchasers, including Petro-Canada, since late last year. The major reason for this reduction can be attributed to inadequate loading facilities compounded by poor winter weather conditions. During bad weather conditions tankers are prevented from loading and as there is only limited crude storage facilities at the two ports being used, crude oil production must be curtailed. This not only results in lower crude exports but also creates a lengthy backlog of vessels waiting to be loaded. Mexico is currently attempting to resolve its technical difficulties and is hopeful of fully meeting contracted volumes in March, including Petro-Canada's 50 MB/D. It should be noted that Mexico has been reducing deliveries to all its customers equally.

To date, eastern Canadian refiners have received approximately 2.6 million barrels of Mexican crude, about 60 per cent of the total volume contracted by Petro-Canada. This has been made up of 52 per cent of the heavier Mayan crude (23° API) and 48 per cent of the lighter Isthmus (34° API). With regard to the quality variations, it is my understanding that most eastern Canadian refiners have sufficient flexibility to refine these types of crudes. Current reports indicate that refiners receiving Mexican crude have experienced no problems in maintaining their desired product yields.

With regard to price, on December 24 Mexico increased the cost of Isthmus crude by $US 4.00 to $US 34.50. These prices only came into effect for January loadings and did not apply to December deliveries as they were not originally part of the accepted program. It should be noted that Mexico traditionally maintains its official selling prices higher than those of OPEC in light of its transportation cost advantage over Persian Gulf exporters. As a result, the average landed cost of Mexican crude delivered to Canada has just been slightly higher than for other imported crudes.

NATIONAL REVENUE

CHILD TAX CREDIT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Thompson asked a question on February 12, concerning the requirement of a signature of a husband attesting to his income when his wife is applying for child tax credit.

The only information on the schedule relating to the child tax credit concerning the husband is his income, to which he is required to provide certification. The Income Tax Act very clearly requires that schedule 10 be completed jointly by the wife and the husband, which clearly implies that it is a shared responsibility. Eligibility for child tax credit is based on family income. The Department of National Revenue has therefore no choice but to enforce the requirement that the husband's signature be obtained.

It should be noted that in the event of a reassessment which would reduce the amount of the credit paid the husband is liable.

Senator Thompson appears to be under the impression that there are a great number of cases in which the child tax credit goes unpaid for lack of the husband's certification. This is not correct. When the department receives an application lacking the husband's signature, the application is returned to the claimant and in almost all cases the matter is quickly resolved.

Head office officials of the department have in fact no record of a complaint that a child tax credit was denied due to inability to obtain the signature of the husband.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

VISIT TO CANADA—PROPOSED AGENDA

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Murray regarding the agenda for President Reagan's visit to Canada. I have received a copy of a block agenda for the President's visit, and perhaps the general points may be of interest to all honourable senators. I will then be pleased to obtain further information, if that is desired.

The President will arrive at 9.30 a.m. on Tuesday, March 10, at Canadian Forces Base, Ottawa and will be greeted by His Excellency the Governor General. At 11 a.m. the President is scheduled to arrive on Parliament Hill, where he will be met by the Prime Minister and the Speakers of the Senate and of the House of Commons. He will be meeting with the Prime Minister in the Prime Minister's office in the Parliament Buildings. At 1 p.m. a working luncheon will be given by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister at 24 Sussex Drive.

At 3.30 p.m. there will be a continuation of meetings with the Prime Minister in the Prime Minister's office in the Parliament Buildings, followed by meetings with the Prime Minister and ministers.

At 6.30 p.m. there will be a gala performance in honour of the President and Mrs. Reagan, hosted by the Prime Minister of Canada, in the Opera of the National Arts Centre. The performance will be televised coast to coast in both languages by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Senator Flynn: Music also?

Senator Perrault: There will be music. I understand that some of Canada's finest talent will be on display.

At 8.30 p.m. a state dinner will be given by Their Excellencies the Governor General and Mrs. Schreyer at Rideau Hall.

On Wednesday, March 11, at 9.30 a.m. there will be a call on President Reagan at Rideau Hall by the Leader of the Opposition. At 10.30 a.m. there will be a tree planting ceremony at Rideau Hall, and at 11 a.m. the President will address a joint sitting of the Senate and the House of Commons. I draw to the attention of honourable senators, that at 11 a.m. on Wednesday, March 11, the President will address a joint sitting of the Senate and the House of Commons in the chamber of the House of Commons.

At 1 p.m. there will be the departure ceremony. The Governor General will bid farewell to the President and Mrs. Reagan at Canadian Forces Base, Ottawa.

That is the agenda that I had promised to bring to honourable senators.

Senator Asselin: Will there be a press conference?

Senator Perrault: I have no information with respect to a press conference. Presumably there will be joint statements at some point during the proceedings.

I was also asked questions regarding the working agenda. That is still under discussion between the two parties. It can be assumed, however—I am quoting from information that I have been provided with—that most of the important concerns between our two countries will be discussed during the President's visit.

Senator Murray: Do we have a full list of what cabinet secretaries will be accompanying the President?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not have that information as yet. However, that information will be requested. I have not been provided with such a list up to this point.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Flynn: What about arrangements in the other place? No doubt they will make room for us in the House of Commons.

An Hon. Senator: For the state dinner?

Senator Flynn: No, for the address to both houses.

Senator Perrault: It is my understanding that appropriate seating will be provided for all honourable senators.

Senator Roblin: I wonder what that means.

• (1500)

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS CONCERNING PROSTITUTION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Nurgitz on March 3, 1981, concerning possible amendements to the Criminal Code on the subject of solicitation.

Last fall the Minister of Justice was in communication with the attorneys general on the subject, and received some different points of view from the provinces on the advisability of moving in that field at this time. Another aspect of the problem is the case on the subject that is at this moment before the Supreme Court. It is traditional for the Minister of Justice to wait until a final determination of a point of law has been made by the courts before he proposes amendments. When the Supreme Court has disposed of that case, we will advise Parliament about what steps, if any, the government proposes to take.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have just received some further information, as of today's date, on the subject of the Garrison project.

By a diplomatic note of December 1, 1980, the United States suggested the commencement of a process of consultations on the Garrison project beginning in March. That process was begun by the visit in January of Canadian scientific and technical experts to the United States for a briefing on technical developments relating to the project.

We remain willing to enter into consultations with the United States but consider that, if these consultations are to be meaningful, the question of current and planned allocations and expenditures on the project must be clarified.

Thereafter, a date for consultations will be set.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask if that statement by the government leader means that the Government of Canada is taking no further initiatives with respect to the matter but is simply waiting for the Americans to indicate whether they will broaden the scope of the discussions, or have we, by diplomatic note, replied, saying that we wish to have a wider field of discussion available to us in order to get to the root of the problem?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, because of the importance and sensitivity of this issue I think it appropriate that I seek more detailed information before I hazard a reply.

Senator Roblin: May I ask a supplementary question? On a previous occasion I referred to the meeting of technical experts in January, and I asked that a copy of their proceedings be made available to us. I was told that that was not considered desirable.

In view of the fact that these new measures being proposed are concerned with whether or not the money to be spent will affect the Canadian problem in this connection or will be entirely restricted to the American aspect, it seems to me that the relevance of the proceedings of the technical experts becomes even more evident than it was before. In view of that, will my honourable friend undertake to review the matter to see if we can find out what is going on?

Senator Perrault: Yes. The full extent of the inquiry of Senator Roblin and of Senator Guay will be directed to the department, and I hope a reply can be obtained.

THE CONSTITUTION

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, to those of you who, with some trepidation, feel they must sit in their places listening to me at length and bearing with me, may I extend the same words of advice that I used to give myself when visiting the dentist: "If I can only get into that chair and stand the pain for the first 10 or 15 minutes, eventually it will go away."

Let me first add my words of commendation to those that have already been expressed so warmly to those of our colleagues who participated in the long and taxing proceedings of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution. I admire all of them for their dedication. Even those on the other side, who chose a direction different from the right one taken by my colleagues on this side, acted, I am sure, in accordance with their conscience. There is no question, in any event, that all the members of the committee acquitted themselves in a manner which did them great credit, and of which they can be proud, and for which they deserve the highest marks.

At this stage of the debate, however, honourable senators, while I exercise my right to participate—because it is the right of all of us to address the constitutional question—I am not vain enough to think for one moment that what I have to say will influence anyone sufficiently to change the direction of his or her thinking, or cause anyone on the government side to change his or her position vis-à-vis the resolution. Nevertheless, it seems to me that at this moment in our history I have a responsibility to voice certain of my feelings concerning the effect that the proposed changes to the Constitution will have on some of those Canadians whom I still like to think I speak for in Parliament.

As Senator Doody explained last evening, what we have to say at this point in time will not change the direction of the government in power any more than has the action of eight of the ten premiers who have spoken for millions of Canadians; or any more than have the many members of Parliament and senators who have opposed the resolution and have already spoken against it; or any more than have the numbers of witnesses and organizations who, representing countless Canadians, appeared before the committee looking for change. If those various individuals, groups and organizations were incapable of affecting a change in the questionable and controversial direction the government has taken, it is not likely that what I have to say will make any difference. Moreover, it is obvious that the government is adamant in holding to its position, ignoring the majority of Canadians, the very people the government is proclaiming the changes in the Constitution will protect.

Honourable senators, when I first came to Parliament in 1968 I was sufficiently naive to think that I could change things for the better for the citizens of Newfoundland who had elected me. I am beginning to doubt that now. When I first came to this great capital of Canada I was proud to be a Canadian. I knew I was fortunate to have been born in Canada. During my growing-up years, as I grew older, I realized how fortunate I was, because I was born of ethnic parents who had fled from the fear of state rule in foreign countries and had come to Canada, where they found comfort and freedom in this country of great potential and opportunity.

I recollect well that as I entered a period of responsibility in my lifetime I realized that, despite being part of a minority group, I was accepted everywhere. I was accepted because of my Canadian upbringing, despite that status.

My first telling experience of Canadianism befell me when I went to war and found that there were no interprovincial boundaries to cross when one offered his services to his country. I was born a Jew in Nova Scotia. I was sent to serve in a French Canadian regiment in New Brunswick. Nobody told me that I could not serve in another province; no one told me that I was of the wrong religion; no one told me that I could not serve with comrades in another province because it was not in the Constitution; nor did anyone tell me that I could not serve alongside French Canadians because I could not speak French, or because that was not in the Constitution either or was not entrenched as part of some document of rights. But I served with those Canadians as comrades because we fought to protect our country; we fought for a common cause.

My second telling experience of Canadianism came after the war, when I decided to move to Newfoundland. Again I traversed the boundaries of another country, but I was accepted in that British colony without question. Then, after 1949, I, along with my fellow Newfoundlanders, joined Canada. Some years later, because I had entered into the new spirit of Canadianism and had contributed towards my new community, I was able to gain enough of the confidence of my fellow Canadian citizens to represent them, as a comparative outside mainlander, as their representative in the Parliament of Canada.

Honourable senators, while I hesitate to use my own experience as a model—and I do so reluctantly—it has struck me that my own experience is part of what Canada is all about. Nobody ever stopped me to say, "You are not complying with the Constitution or with the British North America Act." I am a Canadian by the accident of birth, and the fact that I grew up in Canada was beyond my control. But I was free to move wherever I wished inside or outside the country; I was free to say what I wanted, and free to contribute to the country in which Providence had placed me.

Honourable senators, in those days I did not know much more about the subject of the Constitution than what I had been taught in the few hours given to that subject in elementary school. What I do remember, though, is that every week I stood up with my classmates and pledged allegiance to my country and to the Union Jack. I have participated almost not at all in the debate on the Constitution or the committee, other than to fill in at one committee meeting, but I have heard and read the countless words uttered by many witnesses, some with emotion, many with brilliance. However, I have heard no one who has yet convinced me that it is vital that we drop all our other responsibilities and debate patriation of the Constitution because it will better unite our country. I say that the very opposite is happening. Despite the brilliant words espoused by the constitutional experts that I have listened to, I see anger and hostility creeping amongst Canadians. The words that struck me most are those of Senator Fournier when he said that the majority of people in his area are more interested in the economy, inflation, and the cost of living. I agree with him. There are people who live in fear of losing their homes because of high interest rates on mortgages. There are people who are considered poverty stricken, who cannot bear the cost of living because of rapid increases in oil prices.

In 1867, honourable senators, a group of pretty smart Canadians decided to bring together the different regions or provinces and unite them into a federation. A set of rules and guidelines were drawn up which have brought us along as a nation for some 114 years. We have become a pretty proud nation. We have not succeeded, though, solely because of those rules that were written into the Constitution. We have succeeded because of the people for whom they were written—the individuals who ran away from fear and settled in a free country, Canada; the people who saw a land of opportunity, and suffered and endured to establish a way of life for their families. Here we are today obsessed with the idea that everything else must come to a halt because we must enshrine our rights in words. We must bring home our Constitution amended by Britain, because evidently our leaders do not have the faith and confidence in our own partners in Confederation to do it ourselves, for our own good. I say, "Sure, bring home our Constitution; sure, amend the Constitution," because over the years, as conditions change and the country progresses, the rules must change. But, honourable senators, by all that is right and decent, why this great obsession that all will be lost, that Canada will collapse, if we do not patriate by July 1?

In 1889, somebody by the name of Goldwin Smith said that to make a nation there must be a common life, common sentiments, common aims and common hopes. That was almost 100 years ago. Before it is too late, honourable senators, we should pay heed to those words. If we have failed to agree on a Constitution for 54 years, so what? If we must wait one, five, ten or twenty years, so be it. But let's not do it by imposition, confrontation or dictate. Let's not do it in spite of Canadians, but for Canadians, who still trust those who stand in Parliament to protect the people they represent. There is no earthly reason why continuing negotiations cannot eventually succeed, regardless of how long it takes.

Honourable senators, I ask that we make a country by human feeling, trust and faith. That trust and faith come from inside every Canadian human being, regardless of the words that exist in a paper written with the wrong intent.

During my military service I was struck by a basic and simple lesson, which was that no element of a military force could advance any faster than its slowest troops. The analogy that I extract from that lesson relative to real Canadian life is that our Canadian nation will not advance as long as one-fifth of her population exists in poverty or weakness and cannot keep up with the strong. Nothing in the Constitution will change that fact by the written word, and nobody, whether it be the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice, will persuade anyone, let alone the British Parliament, to ensure, by patriating the Constitution, that all Canadians, regardless of race, creed, colour, origin or status in life, will be more equal. Honourable senators, that just is not so.

The one reference I want to make is to a proposition which was turned down by the government, the clause having to do with property rights. This emphasizes the doubt I have about the whole exercise. Let me quote from the Canadian Bill of Rights:

> It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have existed and shall continue to exist without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex, the following human rights and fundamental freedoms, namely,
> (a) the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law;
> (b) the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law;

What is the reality, honourable senators? Let me read from the research that I had done by the Library of Parliament;

> In Canada today little protection exists for personal or property rights, particularly against assault by government. In a free and democratic society, property rights are regarded as a most fundamental civil right on which other rights are founded. While property rights are seen as fit for inclusion in the Constitution of many democratic countries and in the universal Declaration of Human Rights, in Canada only the Canadian Bill of Rights and several provincial bills offer limited protection for these rights. The Canadian Bill of Rights applies exclusively to federal matters and is limited in its scope, because its provision for due process has been interpreted to mean in accordance with the law. Thus any valid law, no matter how unjust, cannot be impugned through the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Honourable senators, I lived in Newfoundland for many years and represented a very poor part of the province. I saw examples of the taking away of civil liberties and the right to property.

I can remember the resettlement program, when the government, on its own, decided literally to break up and destroy whole communities. People were told that it was for their betterment that they go somewhere else. I remember an elderly couple, over 80 years of age, who moved from a little place called Current Island across 100 feet of water to a place called Pigeon Cove. I went into their house and talked with them. They were very bitter. I said to the man, "What are you going to do now, sir?" He replied, "I'm going to keep looking out that window, right across to Current Island where I grew up and my family was together, and just wait until I die."

Then the famous federal government came to Newfoundland with the idea of giving us a great national park. I was party to the advocacy for that park, but I did not realize what it would do to the small fishing villages, the small communities which were tempted by a few thousand dollars and were told that they would be better off, that there would be more jobs for them, if they moved somewhere else. They are still bitter and they will always be bitter.

People have always had traditional rights. They cut logs for firewood in the winter and gained a few dollars; they fished and they trapped; and all of that was taken away from them on account of the fact that they could no longer go to that land because the federal government wanted it for their Heritage of Canada project, and for the benefit of all Canadians.

● (1520)

A Newfoundlander does not want very much, and never did. All he ever wanted was a piece of land and a home which, because he did not trust the government or the banks, he built year by year and piece by piece until he had his home and felt secure.

Today, because of the inadequacy of government, he cannot even fish any more. If he is over 65 he cannot lay a lobster trap; and, of course, we have given away all our fish to other countries. Is this consistent with the traditional rights of Canadians?

In the city of Corner Brook, just a few months ago, I ran into a man who had a second-hand car business. The day came when the city came along, because they had acquired the right and the money from either the federal or the provincial government, and said to him, "We are taking that away from you." He said, "What right have I to object?" They said, "You have no right. We will expropriate, and you can go to appeal." Of course, he had to take what was given him rather than what he felt it was worth, in order to be able to provide for the future that he wanted for himself, and to give his children the opportunity to take over his business. Then, to add insult to injury, the city sold him a building, and provided him with a deed, but he found later, when he wanted to expand his building, that there was a city pipe under the ground on which the building was situated. This was something that was not even apparent from the plot plan that the city had provided him with. The result was that this man was filled with bitterness and mistrust because he could not do what he wanted with his property.

Honourable senators, we will never have a country if this kind of thing is going to continue. Why could we not enshrine that right to property in the Bill of Rights?

Another thing that has always disturbed me is the question of inequality in regional pay rates in this country. We have a system whereby a federal employee in Newfoundland, working for the Minister of Transport, and doing the same job as his colleague in Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island or Quebec or Ontario, gets less money than they do. If this is not creating bitterness, then I do not know what is.

Honourable senators, we must think about how we have ruined Canada and why we have ruined it. Somebody has to tell the powers that be just what is happening in this country. I see bitterness right across the nation. I see bitterness right in my own province. I see bitterness between the premier of our province and the federal government. All they want in my province is ownership of their resources and their land and the right to the resources of the continental shelf. They also want a measure of control over their most important economic activity, the fishery, together with equal treatment with regard to energy, and the movement of electrical energy to potential markets. They want the protection of the rights of Newfoundland under the Terms of Union.

We are fighting in Canada about the cost of energy and about the price of energy and oil. There is enough hydro-electric power in Newfoundland to supply the whole of the Atlantic region, and indeed, a great part of Canada. Yet we cannot come to terms as to how that is going to be done, and as to how we are going to transfer the power across the gulf. I could cite many other examples, honourable senators, of this sort of thing, but I know that time is of the essence.

We in this Senate, however, can take up the challenge, and before anything worse happens, over the years, we should try to convince the government to get back to the negotiating table. There must be a rebirth of trust and faith between the partners in this federation, and we must make sure that we correct our mistakes so that we may continue to grow in this great country of ours.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, as all of you, I followed very closely the proceedings of the Joint Committee on the Constitution and I have been using the committee reports as a bedside book these past few days.

I would therefore like to congratulate all the honourable senators who served as regular or substitute members on this committee, as well as both co-chairmen. These honourable senators have done us credit by the quality of their interventions and regular attendance, and thanks to television, the Canadian public is now better able to understand our role in Parliament. Partly because of them also, the proposal now before us is a much improved document compared with the original proposition.

Honourable senators, as soon as I read this unilateral constitutional proposal, I felt serious apprehensions and reservations, and until the end of the proceedings, I hoped for substantial amendments as concerns both contents and procedure so that I would not find myself in this difficult position, which is probably the most difficult position I have been in since my arrival in Parliament.

My colleague, Senator Thompson, told us recently in his speech of the anguish he had gone through before taking a dissenting position. I understand his very human reaction, but for my part, my experience was quite different, and I would like to tell you about it very confidentially—and this is not for publication. Pressure was applied by my wife, who simply told me: "If you speak against this project, I believe that I shall not go back to Ottawa."

I waited to see if she would make further threats, but she kept silent for a long time, and I concluded that my wife was not only very cautious, but also that she was giving me the green light.

After much reflection, honourable senators, I shall therefore take a position which I ask you right now to respect as I respect yours.

● (1530)

This unilateral project goes against and negates everything in which I have believed, which I have supported and endorsed in all my years in Parliament. If it remains in its present form, I shall not be able to support it. In my opinion, this unilateral proposal threatens to break up, for all practical purposes, the balance of powers which has always existed between our two levels of government.

Henri Bourassa said that the Constitution of 1867 was the result of an agreement, but in spite of the difficulties brought about by this type of federalism, this Constitution, whose centennial we celebrated a few years ago, has served Canadians well and it has allowed the various provinces to retain and to develop their own identity and what we are very proud to call the Canadian mosaic.

Throughout the years, like most of you, I have had the opportunity to speak in other provinces, and I have always insisted on the fact that each province has special cultural values and traditions which must be jealously protected and that these values are an asset to Canada compared to what was then called the American melting pot.

This package, although it has some attractive aspects, seems to me because of its unilateral nature and especially because of its long term consequences to be used by the federal government to impose upon the provinces a system which will result in an increasing centralization where the federal government will always have greater powers.

This is precisely the pitfall the Fathers of Confederation avoided falling into in 1867 and which most Canadians seem to reject in 1981. With this package, we as members of the Senate, are faced with a double responsibility: our allegiance to a political party and our traditional role as senators especially when the Constitution of our country is involved.

According to the terms of our appointment, we have been summoned to come and serve in this house, in accordance with a well-established custom and tradition, the interests of our region and of our province.

On several occasions since my appointment to the Senate, in spite of some reservations, I voted according to my political allegiance. However, in this case, my convictions are so deep-rooted that I cannot sacrifice them to my party.

Senator Flynn: Hear! Hear!

Senator Deschatelets: This is such a wide package, honourable senators, with such far-reaching consequences that it would take hours just to go over the main aspects. I will restrict myself to a few points and stick to the self imposed reasonable time limit observed by previous speakers. I shall start by commenting on an allegation endlessly repeated to the effect that Canada has been faced with such a serious constitutional crisis for the past 53 or 54 years, that at any cost we must get out of that deadlock. You will say to me: "But it does not matter." On the contrary, I think that is quite important. To be able to weigh the pros and cons of a proposal, we have first to agree on clear and specific premises. If such an allegation was factual, many Canadians could be tempted to justify the unilateral action of the federal government in an effort to bring to an end what seems to be a hopeless deadlock through the extraordinary means which it has suggested.

To my mind an impartial analysis of the facts will not support such an allegation.

I have been in Ottawa as a parliamentarian, for almost 28 years, in fact since 1953. I therefore have had a rather privileged view of the main events that have taken place in Parliament over that period. Doubtless, some will claim that since the Statute of Westminster, federal-provincial relations have been subjected to conflicts, squabbles and difficulties between both levels of government.

I suggest that such problems are not only understandable but unavoidable in a federal system like ours. And we shall see worse in the future, whatever way we choose to go, finally.

There have been several confrontations between the Province of Quebec and the federal government. Those of us who were sitting in the House of Commons at the time are aware of them. There were confrontations as a result of the introduction of joint programs for old age security pensions, the Trans-Canada highway, subsidies to the universities, and many others. Still, solutions were found to all those problems.

If my memory serves me right, my honourable colleague, Senator Lamontagne, was one of the architects if not the architect of the "opting out" formula which gives considerable flexibility to the implementation of joint programs.

Several amendments have been made to the Constitution since the Statute of Westminster. Senator Lamontagne had a list of them in his speech; those amendments were passed at Westminster at the request of the Canadian Parliament. Despite all the precedents variously quoted, not one of them can really be compared to the proposed resolution before us today.

Everyone is free to interpret events as he or she sees fit. As far as I am concerned, it is only in 1960 or 1961 that we discussed in committee, for the first time at the parliamentary level, the problem of patriation, of an amending formula, and a Charter of Rights, and in a way which, I must admit, was most superficial.

It will be remembered that, at that time, a Bill of Rights had been introduced in Parliament by the Diefenbaker government. At that time, I was a member of the Special Committee of the House of Commons in which our group was led by former Senator Paul Martin. That committee was entrusted with the task of considering that bill which was to apply only within areas of federal jurisdiction. The members of the committee wanted to look into the possibility of implementing it right across Canada.

At that point the then Minister of Justice, the Honourable Davie Fulton, who was most anxious, naturally, to see the bill passed as quickly as possible by Parliament, refused to push any further the concept of a national Bill of Rights.

That was the first time, in 1960 or 1961, as I said, that to my knowledge we became aware in Parliament of the magnitude of the constitutional difficulties involved in repatriating the Constitution, and in adopting a Charter of Rights and an amending formula.

I have not consulted the records of that period. I am speaking from memory. But I have a feeling that, at that time, the then Minister of Justice, Mr. Fulton, had drawn up a plan.

• (1540)

It is in 1964, if I remember right, when my late colleague the honourable Guy Favreau became Minister of Justice, that the patriation proposal, with an amending formula, was officially put forward. That formula became known as the "Fulton-Favreau Formula".

That was in 1964, still far away from any acute constitutional crisis, even though the process of constitutional change was not only slow but painful. In the following years confrontation became more frequent. But I do not believe that even today there can be any reference to any emergency threatening the security of the state, because otherwise the support of the people would be obvious. And this is not the case now.

I would now like to make another brief point: after close scrutiny of the resolution and the evidence given by the Minister of Justice before the joint committee, I am convinced that at this point in time, there is a serious doubt whether the proposal is legally and constitutionally acceptable.

We as senators are perfectly entitled to ask ourselves whether it is legally acceptable, and to suggest it should have been put to the test of the Supreme Court of Canada before being introduced.

Honourable senators will recall Omnibus Bill C-60, in which inter alia amendments to the Senate Act were proposed. During consideration by a joint committee of both Houses the legality of the proposals was questioned, and the issue was whether the Parliament of Canada could unilaterally amend the Senate Act without provincial consent.

The government then agreed to refer some questions to the Supreme Court of Canada, and I would invite honourable senators to read very carefully the ruling of that Court, as published December 21, 1979. Quoting from page 24:

> After general examination of the second question, it is felt that although Section 91.1 of the Constitution empowers Parliament to make certain changes to the Senate's present Constitution, it does not empower it to introduce amendments that would alter the basic or essential features given the Senate to ensure regional and provincial representation within the federal legislative system.
> The British Parliament determined the nature of the Senate based on proposals submitted by the three provinces—namely Canada, Upper Canada, Lower Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—to meet the requirements of the proposed federal system. The Senate, created by the Act was granted a legislative role under Section 91. It is our opinion that the Parliament of Canada cannot unilaterally change its basic nature, and is given no such authority under Section 91.1.

Therefore the Supreme Court found that the Parliament of Canada could not unilaterally alter the basic and essential nature or role given the Senate by the Constitution, and it is my humble submission that after this very recent judgment, one need not be a constitutional or legal expert to draw an obvious parallel.

If Parliament cannot unilaterally amend the substance of the Senate Act, it is obvious that the same principle would apply when Parliament tries to amend unilaterally exclusive rights and powers granted in the Constitution to the provinces.

In the speech he delivered in this Chamber on February 26, 1981, Honourable Senator Lamontagne recognized that if this resolution was introduced as a bill, it would be unconstitutional, therefore illegal. These are his words, and I quote from page 1873:

> I do recognize however that several sections deal with provincial jurisdictions and that as such, if the resolution was presented as a bill, it would clearly be unconstitutional. But that is not the issue for now.

I do not fully understand the logic of such a distinction because we are presently debating a proposed resolution which, I suggest, is unconstitutional, but I understand very well the purpose of the honourable senator and it becomes very obvious in the following paragraph, as recorded on page 1874, and I quote:

> In other words, there is no legal requirement and no binding convention that prevents the Canadian Parliament from adopting, without the consent of the provinces, a joint resolution asking the United Kingdom Parliament to amend the B.N.A. Act, even with respect to matters affecting federal-provincial relationships or provincial powers.

This view is akin to the statement made by the Minister of Justice before the Joint Committee, when he said that through a joint resolution of both houses, the Parliament of Canada could even ask Westminster to abolish the provinces. And the speech of our learned colleague, Senator Lamontagne, a well documented speech based on intensive research, refers to a whole series of precedents, legal advice and views from constitutional experts, to support this theory with which I do not agree: As a matter of fact, I have resisted the temptation to list also a whole series of precedents and legal opinions against the argument presented by honourable Senator Lamontagne. I should like to quote from page 1875 of the Debates of the Senate some remarks made by Premier McNair of New Brunswick at the 1950 conference:

> —in consequence the only protection the provinces have today against arbitrary invasion of their rights, powers and jurisdiction is the parliament of Canada itself.

I certainly do not share this opinion. But, for the sake of the argument, do you realize, Honourable senators, that according to this theory, not only are you the judges, but you are the sole judges when you believe that a bill interferes with the rights and privileges of the provinces. Further on, Honourable Senator Lamontagne questions whether there is a rule of law under which the provinces would have to agree to constitutional amendments. And finally, again on page 1875, he states:

> I conclude, therefore, that it is quite proper, in a legal or constitutional sense, for the Canadian Parliament to proceed unilaterally, without the consent of the provinces.

As far as I am concerned—and in this instance I am sure to echo the opinion of most Quebecers—the purely legal aspect aside, this is a new argument which goes against a solidly based concept among us. It is the absolute negation of everything which we have believed in and taught in our universities. It is contrary to all the positions publicly expressed to the federal government by all former Quebec premiers from Sir Lomer Gouin, Taschereau and others. And in case this new thesis has a basis in law, as some would like us to believe, the province which I represent here would have no right whatever, under the present Constitution, to legislate exclusively in some areas which we feel are vital for us. Therefore, since the Statute of Westminster we would have lived with illusory rights of which Parliament now wants to deprive us unilaterally, without even consulting us.

Senator Flynn: Exactly.

Senator Deschatelets: This is a most extraordinary interpretation of common law which goes against the spirit and the letter of the law. In Quebec, from the very beginning not one of our premiers has ever agreed to give up a iota of control in the fields which we consider essential to our survival namely our language, our special civil rights and our exclusive jurisdiction in education.

To support their argument my colleagues have quoted constitutional experts and legal authorities. To support my argument I hope that I shall be permitted to put on record some statements recently made by the Quebec Liberal leader, Mr. Claude Ryan, when he was adressing the National Press Club in Ottawa. This article is under the byline of Miss Michèle Tremblay, Parliamentary correspondant for the Journal de Montréal. This is the title of the article:

> Ryan's opposition to Trudeau's package goes beyond the procedural aspect

Here are some interesting points which I have noted:

> Firstly, Mr. Ryan strongly objects to the fact that this Charter of Rights and Fundamental Freedoms should be included in the Constitution as a result of the goodwill of the British Parliament; secondly added Mr. Ryan, the battle at this time is not fought between separatists and federalists but it revolves around two different concepts of federalism; thirdly, any constitutional deal must take place in Canada between the federal government and the provinces; it will take longer and it will be less dramatic but it will however reflect the true nature of our country which more than any other perhaps, was built and developed on the basis of the continuously renewed agreement of its people, their institutions and their regions.

Honourable senators, now a few words about section 23 of the resolution, under the heading: "Minority Language Educational Rights".

Section 93 of the Constitution gives to the provinces, subject to specific provisions guaranteeing vested rights, the exclusive jurisdiction to legislate on matters of education, and this exclusive jurisdiction is the essential element of our identity in Quebec. However, attractive section 23 of this proposal might be, I cannot accept for any reason an attempt to restrict or to even touch this exclusive jurisdiction for Quebec. I cannot accept a unilateral intervention in this area which is so important for us. Section 93 has always been our Maginot line of defence. We want to solve our linguistic and educational problems ourselves in Quebec, and this proposal is an encroachment that I cannot accept.

I have not only read very carefully the reports of the joint committee on section 23 and the following ones, but I have also reflected on their consequences and tried to determine the degree of encroachment that these sections represent for Quebec. Some people have told us that these provisions do not interfere with the exclusive rights provided under section 93. I think that, with this project, the government is trying to apply a federal framework to this exclusive power because of which it could then tell Quebec: "From now on, you may continue to exercise your right to legislate on language and education, but you will do so within the framework that we are imposing." If we ever accept that the exercise of this power be restricted, we shall lose control over it, and I do not believe that the majority of Quebecers would agree to this.

I am intentionally foregoing making any comment or reflection on Act 101 or the situation of Ontario under section 133 of the Constitution. What I want for Quebec is section 93 to be respected and maintained, and personally, I shall never accept for any reason that it be changed.

I would like to make a brief comment about section 6 of Schedule B of the 1981 constitutional proposal concerning manpower mobility. In principle, I have no serious objection to mobility rights or manpower mobility. These are quite legitimate basic rights which normally result from the vision that we have of a nation, but I can foresee problems when my province tries to implement this new basic right which is to be entrenched in the Constitution. A basic right is not only a theoretical right; it requires a mechanism to apply it.

In some respects, Quebec is not a province like the others. Great care will have to be taken and exceptions will have to be made, if need be, in implementing this right to manpower mobility. We are all aware that in several provinces, such as Newfoundland and Quebec, there now are preferential hiring policies. I shall give as an example Hydro-Quebec, probably the major employer in the province, which finances all its projects and recruits its workers in chronic unemployment areas with unemployment rates always above the national average. Very few details were given in committee concerning the implementation of this right to manpower mobility, but I saw last week that Hydro-Quebec has announced further gigantic projects for which it expects to hire 5,000 new workers by 1985, and a total of perhaps 25,000 by 1990. We all know that because of the language barrier, our jobless in general—and I refer to those who live beyond the limits of Quebec City—are not likely to go and look for work in other provinces, and we apprehend that that right might result in a "one way street" process. I understand that at least seven provinces have ojected to that fundamental right, which if implemented would cause in several areas difficulties the scope of which cannot be clearly assessed at the present time.

Honourable senators, I apologize for taking so much of your time and I shall conclude with some general remarks.

The project before us constitutes a precedent; in parliamentary or constitutional language, a precedent is an action which is invoked afterwards to justify a similar one. It becomes unwritten law, which is as valid and as enforceable as written law. Since 1867 it has been impossible to find a precedent to justify, a project of such scope and consequence as the one before us. In particular, honourables senators, we should bear in mind that the project will not, in any way, solve the jurisdiction problem between the federal and provincial governments.

According to a view generally accepted in Quebec, if ever that project comes back from Westminster in its present form, the provinces will be deprived of many of their powers of negotiation and will be in a position of weakness when the matter of jurisdiction is debated. A status quo period is provided for after Westminster. Federal-provincial conferences will attempt to obtain a consensus and a sword of Damocles will be hanging over the table which may eventually lead to a national referendum if discussions come to a deadlock. Here again, the prospect of a new system for Canada will take us into the unknown.

Honourable senators, this unilateral project is questioned by many Canadians in all provinces, and there is not sufficient consensus among the people I think to justify its implementation, and, even if it were to receive the support of the majority in both houses and be accepted by the Parliament of Westminster, there would be a danger it might prove more divisive in the longer term.

I remember as if it were yesterday the famous professor of economics we had at the University of Montreal, surely one of Quebec's most brilliant minds, Edouard Montpetit, who said, and I think I am quoting him correctly:

> When a government introduces a piece of legislation, however imaginative and attractive it may be, which does not have support at the grass-root level, not only will it not have the expected impact, but it may become divisive.

I ask you ponder over that.

Before concluding, and this may be the more positive aspect of my speech, I want to appeal to the eight premiers who oppose this proposal with all the means at their disposal, even up to Westminster.

I am convinced that we are on a slippery slope, and in the best interests of Canada, I would ask each and every one of these premiers to state publicly that they agree on these two items: first, to the patriation of the Constitution, and second, to an amending formula, even a provisional one, in order to exert enough pressure on the federal government to return to the bargaining table.

Honourable senators, I would like to conclude by quoting the words of Serge Joyal, the honourable member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, who did a magnificent job of co-chairing the joint committee—he is by the way one of my successors in a riding I served for many years. This is what he said at the end of his speech in the other place, and I quote:

> Ten provincial flags will never make a Canadian flag.

That is just a figure of speech, of course, but an eloquent one in terms of the resolution before us. Outside our boundaries, there is but one flag, the Canadian flag, which we are so proud to see in foreign countries, but in Canada, here is another sight to think about, the beautiful sight, at federal-provincial conferences, of eleven flags unfurled in the background side by side, first the Canadian flag followed by the flags of each province according to its date of entry in the Federation. That, for me, is the true symbol of Canada.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, in rising to participate in this debate I am primarily concerned with the problem of addressing you following the excellent and well researched addresses we have heard from many honourable senators who have examined this matter in great detail. I am only sorry that my notes will not provide me with the ability to emulate the excellence of some of the other speeches we have had.

However, I feel as strongly as I did last fall, when speaking to this matter in October—

Senator Flynn: Surprise.

Senator van Roggen: I will come to that, Senator Flynn. Before getting to the substance of my speech, I should like to join other senators in congratulating the members of the joint committee, and particularly its joint chairmen, on the work they did and the manner in which they demonstrated so clearly to the Canadian public, through the medium of television, the work of Parliament being done in the most excellent fashion.

I had a discussion only a few days ago with a gentleman in Vancouver. He was an older man, a businessman, one of those people whom I might describe as a small "c" conservative who is inclined to damn everything to do with government and politicians generally. He had had an illness which had kept him at home for the months of December and January, and he told me that he had watched for many hours, day after day, the work of the committee, and that he was absolutely astonished at the quality of the men and women who participated in the deliberations of that committee on both sides of the table.

So, in my opinion, it was certainly a worthwhile exercise, so far as the Canadian public is concerned, to have had the proceedings televised and for the committee to have worked so diligently.

• (1610)

Last October 30, in speaking to this matter, I made reference to the fact that a large number of speakers in Canada—not all politicians, but including some politicians—had been unnecessarily shrill, in my judgement, in their condemnation and criticism of this package, using expressions such as one editorial I quoted at the time used, namely, that this would be the end of Canada, that it would destroy the country. I then dealt with four main points in the resolution: patriation; the amending formula; the ongoing referendum provisions; and the Charter of Rights. After a short discussion of each of those areas I asked whether or not they, indeed, would be sufficient to destroy this country.

Of course, I do not intend to read that speech into the record again. However, I would mention that part of what prompted me to speak at that time was what I perceived to be the history of the formation of the constitutional framework of Canada. Much of what I had to say at that time, and, indeed, more than that, the conclusions I came to prior to making that speech in support of this resolution were the result of watching on television almost the entire federal-provincial conference of last September—and I will come back to that in a moment.

Some speakers in Canada are inclined—as were the premiers at that conference—to refer to the Government of Canada as being the creature of the provinces. I was appalled to hear the premiers sitting there referring to the Government of Canada as either the creature of the provinces or the agency of the provinces of this country. I am not sure, but they may get that idea from some sort of United States parallel, that of the 13 states banding together to create their federal government. But, in my judgment, that is a totally erroneous parallel to our history. There were some British colonies in North America at the time which were somewhat concerned that the "manifest destiny" policy of the United States—which, following the Civil War, had the largest standing army in the world—would lead the United States to swamp North America. Consequently, they felt that only by forming the country of Canada could they withstand some of those pressures. At least most historians would credit that as being one of the main thrusts at the time towards the creation of a federal state here. So those colonists petitioned the British government at that time to create Canada, which it did by the BNA Act.

If you are talking about the federal government being the agent of the provinces or the creature of the provinces, why did that act, first, in dividing the powers between the provinces and the federal government in sections 92 and 93, demonstrably give to the federal government those powers that would normally go to a senior government, and to the provincial governments those powers that would quite logically devolve upon junior governments—to say nothing of the declaratory power and the power of disallowance of provincial statutes given to the federal government? This was obviously a senior government being created at that time, and to say that it is an agency of the provinces is, in my mind, absolute rubbish.

In 1931 the Statute of Westminster did everything necessary—including granting them the right to amend their own Constitutions—for Australia, New Zealand and the other then dominions, except Canada, which was left out at its own request. Since then we have been bedevilled by a total impasse in constitutional change in this country.

I have read somewhere that at the time it was mentioned that this reservation to Westminster was to be for only a couple of years while we sorted this out. Well, 50 years later we are still trying to sort it out, and I am glad that we are actually about to sort it out.

In my judgment, the reason for this impasse lasting so long is that we are always having trade-offs. We can never discuss or negotiate anything with the provinces that they do not use the occasion to say, "We will agree to that, if we can have something else over here." So you are always dealing in packages, and of course you can never get a whole package, as we have demonstrated. I think the way to amend constitutions is slowly, item by item. They have demonstrated that in the United States, even though they have a very difficult mechanism for amendment.

Coming back to the four main points, I will try to deal with them quickly in view of the lateness of the hour. Certainly, there is no difference of opinion in Canada on the subject of patriation itself. I need not deal with that point. Everyone is agreed, even down to the provincial level. However, as soon as you come to patriation you are faced with the problem that, if you patriate the Constitution without an amending formula, you will then be in an even more difficult straitjacket or block of cement than you are in now. So, at least, you cannot talk of patriation without coupling with it the discussion of an amending formula.

So, we then come to the next step: patriation with an amending formula. The government has come forward with what would seem to me to be the fairest conceivable resolution of this difficult problem, in that they have taken the Victoria Charter and have said that we will have unanimity, which everybody is talking about, for two years while we have federal-provincial conferences and try to agree on an amending formula. If at the end of that two years we are unable to agree, we will put forward the Victoria Charter—the only one, incidentally, of these various formulas which was agreed to by both the federal government and all of the provinces, albeit momentarily because one province had a change of heart—and that was formulated only about nine years ago. Furthermore, they said, if they were unable to reach an agreement with the provinces at that time, if seven of the provinces were to agree on their own amending formula, that would be put before the people of Canada and they could make their choice between the alternatives: either the provincial proposal or the federal proposal. Now, what in a democracy could conceivably be a fairer resolution of an impasse that has lasted all these years?

Senator Flynn: Are you really serious?

Senator van Roggen: I will come to the Tory position in a moment, Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn: With respect to the referendum, if you say that the majority of the Canadian population would impose an amending formula on provinces which would not, I suppose, have any veto powers—

Senator van Roggen: No.

Senator Frith: That is not undemocratic.

Senator Flynn: Well, you mentioned seven provinces. That means three provinces would be out and the will of the majority would be imposed on them.

Senator Frith: I thought there was some relationship between democracy and the rule of the majority.

Senator Flynn: Well, you could dispense with minorities in that case.

Senator McElman: Order!

Senator Flynn: There is no problem of order. If the honourable senator does not want to entertain my question, he does not have to, and I don't think he needs the assistance of Senator McElman, either.

Senator van Roggen: I don't. I rely on the assistance of your leader, Mr. Clark, and others.

Senator Flynn: Of course.

Senator McElman: There is a question of order here because you are conducting a debate, not asking a question.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator McElman: You are indeed.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator van Roggen: At any rate, the government has chosen in this procedure to settle upon the Victoria formula, and the Conservative Party says, "Oh, no. You should not do that. You should settle on the Vancouver formula."

With respect to either the Victoria formula or the Vancouver formula, there seems to me to be absolutely no difference in the position of the government and the opposition at this point insofar as unilateral action is concerned, because Mr. Clark and the Conservative Party take the position that there is nothing wrong with unilateral action in patriating the Constitution and in imposing an amending formula.

Senator Murray: Nonsense!

Senator Flynn: No!

Senator van Roggen: That is the Conservative position. With respect to the Vancouver formula, of course, they can fall back on the fact that it was agreed to by all of the provinces. Well, it was not agreed to by the federal government. The Victoria formula comes closer, because it was also agreed to by the federal government.

Senator Murray: That was ten years ago.

Senator van Roggen: I wholly support the Prime Minister in his rejection of the Vancouver formula—and I said this last October—because of the opting-out procedures which would create a checkerboard of Canada over a period of years. Let me quote the Conservative spokesman in the House of Commons on the subject of the Constitution. According to the Ottawa Citizen of March 2:

> Epp now seems to have accepted Trudeau's argument, dropping the previous Conservative policy of support for the Vancouver formula.

• (1620)

Quoting Mr. Epp, the Citizen says:

> "On the charter, you can't have opting out," he told the Young Conservatives meeting.
>
> "If rights are going to be entrenched, those rights have to be universal rights across the country."
> Toronto's David Crombie spoke to the meeting in similar vein.

I am glad that Mr. Epp is proving to be so sensible and flexible as to realize that those provisions in the Vancouver formula are really not suitable for Canada and were properly rejected by the federal government.

Senator Flynn: No, that is not what he said.

Senator van Roggen: So we seem to have agreement at the level of the Parliament of Canada, among all parties, on patriation and patriation with an amending formula. There is some dispute as to which amending formula might be used, but the government has provided, in the two-year period with unanimity and the referendum provisions, the most democratic solution possible to a choice between the two if the parties cannot come to an agreement in that period of time. It is my contention that they will come to an agreement in that two-year period, for the simple reason that the provinces will not be in a position to trade off oil and fish against amending formulas.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator van Roggen: When you get the provinces to the table under those conditions, then you will hear the provinces beginning to talk some sense.

Senator Flynn: We have no oil or fish in Quebec anyway!

Senator van Roggen: So much for the criticism of unilateral action. It is agreed to by all parties, though there may be a question as to how many subject matters should be covered by unilateral action—the Charter of Rights being included in this and not agreed to by all as a suitable subject for unilateral action. However, the principle of unilateral action is certainly accepted.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator van Roggen: I would suggest that the next point of major contention in this resolution is the ongoing referendum provisions, which were questioned by several of us in our speeches at the time of the introduction of this resolution last fall. A desire was expressed that the ongoing referendum provisions be tightened up; that they become demonstrably a logjam-breaking mechanism. A good deal has been done by the committee along those lines—perhaps, as Senator Steuart said in his remarks, not as much as everyone would have liked, but certainly there has been a move in the right direction. I would ask honourable senators if they really believe, after federal-provincial conferences coming to impasses on questions between the provinces and the federal government, that the federal government is going to be cavalier in running to the referendum process, when it must take that referendum to every region in Canada and have it passed by individual majorities in all of the regions, including the possibility of a total veto by a majority of the people of Quebec if there is anything contained in it that Quebec does not like.

Senator Flynn: You can by-pass the veto.

Senator van Roggen: Senator Deschatelets, only a few minutes ago, was saying that the federal government, through this mechanism, would be able to destroy the rights of Quebec. I say that is not possible under that mechanism. There has been a great deal of talk about a referendum being "un-British", not a thing we should have in the British parliamentary system, something foreign to our system, and so on. I need only refer you to Australia, which has used its referendum provisions, I think, 30-odd times, and I believe that the people have rejected the government proposals in all but four or five of those 30-odd referenda—which just proves that the public are sometimes perfectly capable of looking after themselves when governments put foolish ideas before them.

Senator Flynn: I am not too sure about that.

Senator van Roggen: Britain had a referendum on the Common Market; and we have had one before in Canada. I am not arguing with you, Senator Flynn, and saying that the referendum is something I want you to buy. I am simply arguing my position that it is not something that is going to destroy this nation, which some speakers—not you—would like to have us believe.

Senator Flynn: It could.

Senator van Roggen: Don't say, "it could". Come now, please; let's be sensible. This is a place of sober second thought, and I do not think that we should be stretching for straw men of such a remote character as that. At any rate, I do not want to belabour that point because I would like to deal with a few others.

I come now to the Charter of Rights. The premiers, as demonstrated at that conference and others, are the great opponents of entrenching rights. Of course, I need only refer honourable senators to any one of a number of provincial acts to find for them examples of depredations of human rights in province after province in this country. As many members of the press and other writers express, we have a "double standard" of political morality in this country, as between the provinces and the federal government. I argue that that is largely because we have a bicameral system at the federal level, and bills such as some I have seen being passed in some provincial legislatures would not pass in this chamber. When I made that comment last October, Senator Flynn, said, "If we are still here." Well, now we will be here—

Senator Roblin: Don't count on it!

Senator van Roggen: —and we will maintain that higher standard, I hope, at this level. At least, with the entrenchment of a Charter of Rights, some of those provincial governments may hesitate before passing the types of legislation they have passed previously and which I referred to but cannot take the time to document right now.

Senator Flynn: The War Measures Act is still on the statute books.

Senator van Roggen: I cannot hear you.

The day before I spoke last fall, Senator Nurgitz had given a very eloquent and reasonable argument on the other side of the question with regard to entrenching rights. There are many lawyers and judges in Canada who argue that rights should not be entrenched because anomalies such as occur in the United States will develop. I can find just as many lawyers and judges who will argue on the other side, that the people of Canada will be better off with rights entrenched. I am of the view that they should be entrenched, and I spoke on that in the Senate almost 10 years ago; it is nothing new for me. I am simply saying that you can have two points of view. Entrenchment of rights will not all of a sudden destroy the country.

As regards entrenching those rights, I have a difficult time with the opposition in this house, because every time an opponent to the Charter of Rights speaks and says, "They don't have them in England; they don't have them in Australia; but they have them in Russia," all the opposition members pound their desks in great glee and delight, and barrack away over there, obviously opposed to the total concept of a Charter of Rights at all. Well, their party position is that they are in favour of a Charter of Rights. They just say that it should not be imposed unilaterally. Now let's have it one way or the other. Are you in favour of a Charter of Rights, as your party is? Then let's have a Charter of Rights. You say that it must not be implemented unilaterally. Fine, we will argue that point, but let us not argue about the merits of a Charter of Rights.

With regard to the quality of the Charter of Rights, the one brought in by the government was examined in the committee at length, and there were 67 amendments made to it by members on all sides of the house. The study entailed three months of committee work, with 100 witnesses appearing, and 1,200 briefs being submitted. In the democratic process a time eventually arrives when this comes to an end and you fish or cut bait. Some people have described this as one of the finest charters in the world. I am not for one moment suggesting that it will never need to be amended or improved.

I would like to leave the subject of the Charter of Rights now and move on, for a moment, to discuss property rights, since I am a strong proponent of property rights being included in a charter. I might just mention that property rights were included in Bill C-60. The federal Liberal government is not opposed to this proposal. Unfortunately, the NDP is strongly opposed to these rights, for reasons we can all imagine. If you fellows would just come along with us on the Constitution and the package, we will put the property rights in, and away we'll go.

Senator Roblin: Now what are you bargaining?

Senator Flynn: You are bargaining with us.

Senator van Roggen: When you are doing something important, what is wrong with bargaining in Parliament? Is that never done?

Senator Roblin: The Prime Minister doesn't like it.

Senator van Roggen: That is why they are always in the opposition, I suppose.

Senator Flynn: We are certainly too honest, by comparison.

Senator Frith: We are just trying to be bilateral.

Senator van Roggen: Again, I do not see how this Charter of Rights—which may include a few commas and "ts" crossed and uncrossed, which one person likes and another person does not like, but which is the best effort of many draftsmen in that committee and after years of work—is a thing that is going to "destroy" Canada.

• (1630)

I now come to a few general points that I will try to deal with quickly, so that we can all go home.

The first thing I would like to say is that far from taking something away from the provinces, it seems to me that we are giving the provinces something very substantial.

I believe Senator Lamontagne is correct—

Senator Flynn: A great lawyer; a great legal mind.

Senator van Roggen: —in his description of the legal situation, namely, that we have the right in the federal Parliament to amend our Constitution by joint address, as we are now endeavouring to do, as opposed to the situation as outlined by Senator Thompson, who, in a very well researched and brilliant exposition in his long speech here the other night, developed the theory of the conventions and usages which we have endeavoured to use these last 50 years to get unanimity and find solutions.

The Manitoba court has held, of course, that these conventions and usages are not the law of the land, and that the legal situation is that we can go ahead and make this amendment. I think it is demonstrably clear that once we get this amendment by means of this resolution, and our Constitution back here with either the amending formulas proposed, or those that will come out of the process two years from now, the provinces are all of a sudden going to find themselves completely in charge of their destiny, as far as amendments to the Constitution are concerned, and in a better and much stronger position than they are in today.

Senator Flynn: Not with the referendum!

Senator van Roggen: Insofar as the provinces having to give unanimous consent is concerned, I need hardly mention that I was delighted the other day to see Mr. Hees, in the other place, see the light completely, insofar as the provincial governments are concerned, and I quote a report in the Globe and Mail:

> "I've given up completely on the provinces", veteran Tory MP George Hees said in an interview . . . "They're just horse-traders for oil and fish."

I am sorry he used only oil and fish. I probably would have used some other things to include Quebec, but I am only quoting him. Hees went on to say that the Parliament of Canada is the place where this should be dealt with, and is the perfectly competent and proper place for it to be dealt with. And, of course, we agree with him.

Senator Flynn: He and Senator Lamontagne are two great legal minds.

Senator Roblin: One and a half.

Senator van Roggen: I want to deal with clause 44 for a moment.

Senator Connolly: You mean the old clause 44.

Senator van Roggen: Yes, the old clause 44. Firstly, under the original resolution the on-going referendum provision could not be employed by the Government of Canada without the consent of the Senate. That was in there then, and it was in there very deliberately. I mentioned that previously, and Senator Flynn again quite properly said, "Yes, if we are still here." I think it is important to point out that the removal of clause 44 still preserves that protection for the people of Canada in so far as the on-going referendum procedure is concerned.

Senator Flynn: We have not proved that.

Senator van Roggen: In the second place, the removal of clause 44 is something that not all of us in this chamber felt necessary. I, for one, was very determined that clause 44, either in itself or under clause 51, should be amended sufficiently to guarantee that we had a bicameral Parliament permanently in Canada. Whether it would include this Senate, or an elective Senate, perhaps does not matter so long as some form of second chamber exists. I like a system of checks and balances. I think this is essential in a democracy, if we are not to have a tyranny of the majority.

I simply want to make the point that I personally would have been content with amendments to establish only that a bicameral system of government would be continued in Canada, and that the House of Commons could not simply abolish the Senate, which is accomplished by the withdrawal of clause 44, but which goes farther than I would have personally felt was necessary in order for me to support this package.

What I want to put on the record is that I hope that other senators will join with me, as one who is determined to see us introduce Senate reforms of our own in due course, rather than falling back on the removal of clause 44 from this package as an excuse for simply doing nothing about the Senate for years into the future. I want to make a firm undertaking to the public of Canada that we will see that intelligent and reasonable reforms to the Senate are proposed and introduced in this chamber.

Senator Flynn: An elective Senate?

Senator van Roggen: Again, in keeping with my promise to get Senator Flynn home on time, I am going to finish by saying that certainly we are breaking with tradition in order to break this impasse that has existed for so many years. We are doing so in a fashion that will provide for amendments in the future, in such a way that the provinces will be very well protected by either the amending formulas proposed or others that are yet to be formulated. For that reason I want to say, honourable senators—in case you are in doubt after hearing my remarks—that I will be supporting this resolution, and that I urge you all, on the other side of the house, to join me in doing so.

On motion of Senator Flynn, for Senator Smith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 10, 1981, at 3 p.m.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

SCHEDULED COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, regarding this afternoon's scheduled meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, there is, in a sense, a two-fold problem.

At some considerable time in the past, the committee was scheduled to meet this afternoon at 4.30. I have been advised that four witnesses have left Toronto by plane and are scheduled to arrive here at approximately 3 o'clock.

As honourable senators know, a function is scheduled for 6 o'clock this evening which I am sure some members of the committee will wish to attend.

In addition to that, by the luck of the draw, I am scheduled to make a speech this afternoon on the Constitution. Although I am always brief, my speech is bound to take some time, so, subject to the approval of the members of the committee and other honourable senators, I have arranged that the clerk of the committee, Mrs. Aline Pritchard, will meet the witnesses at the door of the building in which her office is located; that she will escort them to the committee room when they arrive, which will probably be well before 4.30 p.m.; and that she will inform me when they have arrived. However, in the ordinary course of events and considering the way matters are scheduled, I suspect that I shall be making a speech at that time.

At the last sitting Senator Frith was kind enough to move that the committee be authorized to sit this afternoon while the Senate is sitting, so we do, in fact, have leave to sit at any time the witnesses are available.

If it should turn out that I am engaged in inflicting my words of wisdom on the house when the witnesses arrive, perhaps the members of the committee, upon being so informed, could go to the committee room, and if Senator Langlois is available, I would ask that he, being deputy chairman, preside. Should he not be available, I would ask that the committee members select from among their number someone to preside, since there is really very little time between 4.30 p.m., and the hour at which members of the committee will have to leave if they intend to be at some other place at 6 o'clock.

I have outlined the problem, and I would ask the co-operation of the committee members and the Senate in order to resolve this dilemma, not for my sake but for the sake of the witnesses representing the Canadian Manufacturers' Association who have come from Toronto. We should see that they have the necessary time to make their presentation.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps I might offer a constructive suggestion, because I clearly see the dilemma faced by my honourable friend, Senator Smith. The principal matter between him and his speech, I believe, is the Question Period. It seems to me that we, on this side, would probably be willing to forego the priority of Question Period and proceed with Order No. 3 at this time. We could then revert to Question Period, if there are any matters of grave importance we want to discuss at that time. This would enable the debate on Order No. 3 to proceed in the normal way. All those who wish to speak could do so, and not just Senator Smith. Would that be helpful?

● (1510)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think that is an excellent suggestion. The only problem I foresee is that Senator Olson may not be available later in the day. He might want to say something about that. Otherwise, I think it is a good suggestion, and we support it.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am sure that members opposite can get along without me for one day.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no!

Senator Olson: As a matter of fact, I will be leaving the chamber at 3.30 p.m., whatever stage we reach. I would be very happy, though, to come full of great answers and information tomorrow.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, Senator Olson's threatened absence throws a cloud over our whole proceedings.

[Senator Smith.]

In any event, I think we could probably rely on the expectation that we will meet with him tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: In view of the obvious co-operation, I take it that the suggestion made by Senator Roblin is agreed to.

NATIONAL FINANCE

ACCOMMODATION PROGRAM OF DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS—COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO REVIEW RECOMMENDATIONS

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e)

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to review, with the appropriate ministers and officials, the recommendations contained in the report of the said committee on "The Accommodation Program of the Department of Public Works."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators will recall that some two years ago the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance published a report on the Accommodation Program of the Department of Public Works which contained some 56 recommendations. It was stated at that time that it was the committee's intention, after reviewing it with the appropriate departments, to ask the departments to report on their implementation of the recommendations. The purpose of this motion is to resurrect that report.

A meeting is scheduled for this Thursday at 1.15 p.m., at which the committee will meet with the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Public Works to discuss the recommendations in the report.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AND TRADE AGREEMENTS

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and consider the subject matter of Bill C-50, intituled: "An Act to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal the Irish Free State Trade Agreement Act, 1932, the Union of South Africa Trade Agreement Act, 1932 and the United Kingdom Trade Agreement Act, 1937", in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 5, the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to express my appreciation of your thoughtfulness and accommodating spirit in so kindly agreeing to the arrangements with respect to the committee meeting I spoke about some few minutes ago. I turn now to the words of wisdom I mentioned in those few remarks a little while ago, and as I rise to take part in this debate I emphasize that it is not, as some would have us believe, a debate on patriation of the Constitution.

I am strongly for the patriation of the Constitution and have been for many years, and so, I believe, is every member of my party in both the Senate and the other place. But it is one thing to want patriation with an amending formula agreed to by a majority of the provinces—which is, I believe, what we ought to be looking for—and it is quite another thing to do what we are being asked to do now. If the original motion had been introduced in that form, I believe it would have been passed long ago with little debate, and would now have passed the British Parliament and very likely would be the law in Canada.

But, I say again, this is not a debate about patriation. The debate we are having concerns unilaterally asking the Parliament of a foreign nation to do something to which the provinces of Canada have not consented, and which would be illegal and unconstitutional if attempted in Canada without such consent.

Honourable senators, I should like to add my words of congratulation to the many words of that nature which have been spoken about the work of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, which worked so hard and so long at this resolution. No matter what one's opinon may be about the merits of what has resulted from the work of that committee, there can be no doubt that its members deserve not only the thanks of the two houses of Parliament but the thanks of the country for the dedicated way in which they carried out their work.

Since one of the co-chairman of that joint committee was Senator Hays, I am glad to say to him that we are all proud of the work that he did in carrying out his sometimes onerous duties.

● (1520)

A great many speeches have been made, and I suppose there will be more. While I do not intend to refer to all of them, there are some to which I would like to make reference. For instance, I notice that in opening the debate in this house, Senator Austin, very early in his speech, said:

> —I also feel deeply the responsibility for marshalling in a clear and cogent way the desirability and, even more, the necessity of taking this critical step forward at one of the most decisive moments in Canadian political life.

It seems to me that if, as Senator Austin said, he accepted the responsibility for making a case for this proposal "in a clear and cogent way," his effort to do so was a great deal less than successful. Of course, I think he was somewhat unfair to himself in assuming the responsibility to show something that does not exist, and so I suppose that one should not judge his efforts too harshly.

Senator Austin also said in his speech that this joint resolution is evidence of the response of the rest of Canada to the Quebec referendum in 1980. Well, I am certainly not so familiar with the attitude of the people of Quebec towards this resolution as are those of my friends who live in that province. If, however, one can judge from what those friends say and from what one can observe in the press, on television and elsewhere, what the people of Quebec think of this resolution does not seem to square with what Senator Austin thinks they think. It does not seem to appear to them at all in the light in which Senator Austin refers to the matter.

What evidence is there to support Senator Austin's contention? What do the leaders of all three provincial political parties say—though I recognize, of course, as well as anybody, that one of those political parties is dedicated to leaving Canada, in any event, and that one must keep this in mind in assessing what they may say? What is the attitude of the editors of the major newspapers of either language in Quebec? As I understand from what I see, read and hear, the majority of those editors have been expressing their dissatisfaction, not only with the substance of the resolution but also with the process by which the whole thing is being handled. What do the people of Quebec themselves think? Well, I suppose that is very hard to assess, and I do not intend to do so, but I do note that some people who are skilled, or who allege they are skilled, in assessing the views of the people—and I refer to the Gallup poll—have found that 61 per cent of the people of Quebec are not satisfied, either with the substance of the resolution or the process by which it is being handled.

I also noted in the press last week that a distinguished Canadian lawyer, who was once a member of the Supreme Court of Canada and retired from it of his own volition, Mr. Yves Pratt, presided over a triumvirate of lawyers, including himself, in preparing a written opinion for the Government of Quebec as to the legality, the constitutionality or otherwise of this proposal. As I have already said, no one can deny that the Government of Quebec is not very enthusiastic about federalism. Similarly, no one can deny that Mr. Yves Pratt is a distinguished Canadian who believes in federalism and is—and I have no reason to believe otherwise—a very close friend of the Prime Minister of Canada. Yet, if one looks at the Globe and Mail of March 4, 1981, one can see that in the written opinion prepared at the request of the province, that a triumvirate of lawyers presided over by Mr. Yves Pratt says that the charter will change the rules of the constitutional game in Canada, and goes on at some length about it.

• (1525)

All of the evidence I have been able to find does not bear out the allegation made, not only by Senator Austin but by many others, that this resolution is a response to the verdict of the people of Quebec in the referendum of May last.

I must now make mention of the splendid speech delivered by Senator Tremblay. It was comprehensive, learned and clear, and ought to be required reading for anyone who wishes to understand what this debate is about. I shall perhaps quote from it as I speak today. In any event, I am sure that Senator Tremblay deserves our very warm thanks for all the work and ability he must have put into the task of preparing it.

I listened with great interest to the learned speech delivered by Senator Lamontagne, and I certainly congratulate him on the depth and quality of his research, which must have been extremely comprehensive and must have involved a great deal of effort, although I must say that as I listened to Senator Thompson's speech I wondered whether some of the quotations or citations that Senator Lamontagne gave us were as full and complete as they could have been.

It may well be that Senator Lamontagne convinced himself and many other senators that there is no legal rule requiring the agreement of all the provinces before an Address is sent to Her Majesty asking for changes in the Constitution. It may be that in matters relating to the Canadian Constitution, just as in everything else, the British Parliament has the legal right to pass any law it pleases. I do not dispute that proposition, which I think is probably accepted throughout the common law portion of the world. It may even be that Senator Lamontagne is correct in these two assertions, but we do not know that, since the Supreme Court of Canada has not made any pronouncement on either of them.

Honourable senators, even if Senator Lamontagne is right on both these legal questions, however, that is no answer to the fact that what this proposal amounts to is an attempt to have the British Parliament deal with the rights of Canadians in a way that the Prime Minister is not prepared to leave it to Canadians to do, as and when and to the extent that Canadians may wish. This is simply an attempt to do in Britain what cannot be done in Canada.

Honourable senators, insofar as I am concerned, Senator Lamontagne can be completely right, in a legal sense, on the two points that he emphasized. I believe, however, that that is completely irrelevant to the objection which lies at the centre of my opposition to this proposal. I object, honourable senators, to the Government of Canada going on bended knee, like a subject nation, to the parliament of another country, and asking that foreign parliament to impose laws upon Canada which could not be imposed by Canadians without the consent of the provinces. To me, that is being colonial in the most objectionable sense. It is a bare-faced attempt to get Britain to do what Canada cannot do, and to circumvent the Supreme Court of Canada.

I now come to Senator Thompson's speech. It does seem to me that Senator Thompson disposed pretty thoroughly of most of Senator Lamontagne's arguments in a clear and decisive way—

Senator Flynn: He certainly did!

Senator Smith: —and I do not think they carry very much persuasive value now.

The speech of Senator Thompson must have been a very difficult one for him to make, as must have been the case with others of his colleagues who took a similar stand. I honour and congratulate them for their courage. And I congratulate Senator Thompson, too, on the extraordinary research on which his speech was based, and on the clear and eloquent way in which he marshalled his facts and presented his reasoning. I think that no one can dispute his facts, or that his conclusions from those facts are clear, logical and convincing. I intended to present some of those historical facts and arguments myself, although not in the depth that he did; but he presented them so well that all I need say is that I agree with his facts, his reasoning and his conclusion.

• (1530)

Senator Steuart entertained us with quite a lively speech a few days ago. He was very entertaining; but, honourable senators, I must say that he took great care not to let his entertainment value be diminished by either facts or reason. Indeed, as I listened to him, I could visualize him sitting in the Saskatchewan Legislature as Leader of the Opposition, participating in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, or on a budget speech, and trying to divert attention from the facts in that Speech from the Throne, or budget speech, by being as lively, as witty, as vigorous and sometimes, I think, even as loud as he could possibly be, and thus restore morale to his colleagues—just as those on his side must have needed a restoration of morale after the way Senator Thompson took apart the flimsy arguments we have listened to on their behalf here over the last little while. That is about all one need say about Senator Steuart's speech. I appreciated it as a work of art, and I congratulate him upon the splendid execution of a distracting and entertaining presentation.

Senator Steuart: Bless you; bless you.

Senator Smith: I did not hear what Senator Steuart just said, but I am sure it was complimentary.

Senator Steuart: I said, "Bless you; bless you."

Senator Smith: I am afraid that blessing might not be quite the laying on of hands.

Honourable senators, a great deal has been said, earnestly and sincerely, by those who support the idea of a Charter of Rights. A great deal has been said about the wonderful improvement and the wonderful benefits that this proposed charter will bring to the lives of the people of Canada.

I believe there has been a great deal of exaggeration about the alleged benefits which will result. Indeed, I am inclined to the view that in the long run the proposed transfer of authority to the courts from Parliament and the legislatures may be very disappointing to those who are now looking forward to receiving so much from such a transfer. Certainly, such a transfer will make the process of keeping up with changing social, political and legal values much more difficult than would be the case if the authority were left in the hands of the people through their elected representatives.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith: One has only to look at our great neighbour to the south—whose head of state is doing us the honour of visiting us today—to make this observation. The difficulty of getting their Constitution changed, for example, to provide for equal rights legislation for women, ought to be a clear lesson in this respect for all of us. This agitation has been going on in the United States for I don't know how many years and has not yet been brought to fruition, although a legislature could have done so very quickly.

Honourable senators, some people, in explaining the benefits which they think will flow from the Charter of Rights, make reference to the tragic experience of Japanese Canadians on the Pacific coast during the second world war, and seem to believe that the Charter of Rights would prevent such a thing from ever happening again. That argument, in my opinion, is a most misleading one. I deplore the action which was taken on behalf of the people of Canada on that occasion; but one has only to recall the extraordinary circumstances in which it took place to have the gravest doubts as to whether in similar circumstances similar action would not occur, no matter what a Charter of Rights might say. It is worth recalling too that the existence of highly praised constitutional provisions of the United States did not prevent their taking the same or, at least, very similar action to that which was taken in Canada.

I would not oppose a Charter of Rights if the process of obtaining it took proper account of the rights of the provinces; but I have very little confidence in the good it might do; and I believe there are a good many honourable senators whose views would not be greatly different from mine.

As to equalization, much has been made of the fact that the draft Constitution, in clause 34(2), commits the Parliament and the Government of Canada to the principle of equalization payments. While the principle of equalization is of vital importance to those provinces, such as my own province, which are less well off than others, this provision will neither help nor improve the situation.

The principle of equalization may be contained in the new Constitution, if and when it comes about, but if it comes about as it now reads in that draft resolution, there is absolutely no way of applying any legal sanctions to the Government of Canada, or any other government, if that principle is not followed. It does not make a jot or tittle of difference as to equalization. Who is going to say to the Government of Canada, "The equalization payment you are now giving us is not in conformity with what you were committed to in the Constitution," and enforce it? I can envisage the present Government of Canada saying, "Well, that's all right. If you don't like it, see if you can get us dislodged from office at the next election;" and they will go on and do whatever they please, whether or not it is in the Constitution.

As I said on an earlier occasion, equalization without some sanction or some means of enforcing it is no more valuable or useful than are the present arrangements. I emphasize again that equalization, whether or not it is in the Constitution, will be carried out exactly the way the Government of Canada decides, insofar as federal funds are concerned, unless there is some legal way to enforce that principle.

All we have to do is turn to the provision in the resolution, which simply reads:

> Parliament and the Government of Canada are committed to the principle of making equalization payments to ensure that provincial governments have sufficient revenues to provide reasonably comparable levels of public services at reasonably comparable levels of taxation.

That is the principle, if honourable senators will pardon a personal reference, that I have been arguing in Ottawa for well over 20 years. That is the principle on which equalization is now based, and that is the extent of the proposed provisions of the Constitution. One has only to read it and look at the present situation to know that it is not, in the slightest, any more or any less than what is now happening, and that there is no way to enforce it under the provision as we see it.

Honourable senators, I now turn to the question of a referendum. Firstly, I should like to refer to the referendum provisions which appear in Part V under the heading "Interim Amendment Procedure and Rules for its Replacement," clauses 36 to 44.

• (1540)

Clause 42 is under the "Interim Amendment Procedure" heading, but, according to my reading of the resolution, by that provision a permanent amendment may be made—or, at least, an amendment as permanent as any other that can be made. According to that clause, within two years of the coming into force of the act, the legislatures of seven or more provinces having at least 80 per cent of the total population may make a proposal to be substituted for the permanent amendment proposal under clause 45(1)(b) which, of course, is essentially the Victoria formula. If seven or more provinces do that, then the Government of Canada shall cause a referendum to be held to decide whether that provincial formula, agreed upon by seven or more provinces having 80 per cent of the population, "or paragraph 45(1)(b)"—the Victoria formula—"or any alternative thereto approved by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons . . . shall be adopted."

In the first place, instead of encouraging the provinces to agree on a formula in the hope that it would be accepted, it would seem to me that this would drive them away from any agreement. How can you expect seven or more provinces to agree on a formula and propose it, knowing full well that the Government of Canada can hold a referendum as to whether that proposal will be adopted or any other proposal passed by the Senate and House of Commons will be acceptable and become our Constitution?

This referendum would be decided by all the people of Canada, with no restriction as to majorities in any province. While I have nothing against Ontario or Quebec, I cannot help but observe that with well over one half of the population of the country in these two central provinces, they could, and in all probability would, dominate the voting, with no protection being provided for the rest of us at all. That does not seem to me to be fair or reasonable, and, I submit, will clearly be a strong incentive for the provinces not to risk getting themselves into that kind of situation by agreeing on any new proposal during the interim period. If they do agree, they then run the risk of having their agreement defeated by some as yet unknown federal alternative in a referendum which gives no protection whatever to regions or provinces. Honourable senators, I submit that this is a provision which is worse than useless, which is divisive and which ought not to be included in the proposal.

There is another referendum proposal which is found in clause 46. This is applicable after the interim period has expired. You will note that it gives some protection to the provinces. It requires that there be a national majority and a majority in Ontario, in Quebec, in two or more of the western provinces having at least 50 per cent of the western population, and in two or more of the Atlantic provinces. It is not easy to understand why the same protection is not given in a referendum pursuant to the interim procedure under clause 42, which I referred to a moment ago.

I agree with the preceding speakers who have argued that the referendum has no place in the Canadian system of government. A referendum is bound to be divisive. It is likely to be decided partly by the feeling of the moment about some particular subject, and partly by the most efficient propaganda rather than by the intrinsic, long-term merits of the questions. It is inconsistent with our parliamentary system of government, and I repeat that it has no place in our Constitution.

I will now turn to the question of the Parliament of the United Kingdom. A few days ago my colleague, Senator Macquarrie, made reference to the deplorable situation which seems to have developed between the Government of Canada and the Government and the Parliament of the United Kingdom. Senator Macquarrie did so eloquently, clearly and in a most interesting way, and I shall not try to repeat what he said. He expressed my views better than I could have done, and I commend them to honourable senators.

I cannot refrain, however, from saying how reprehensible I find the conduct of the Prime Minister of Canada and the Secretary of State for External Affairs in making the insulting threats they have been about what Canada is going to do if the United Kingdom Parliament does not do what Canada wants. I do not find such conduct consistent with the dignity of Canada or with the dignity with which I believe relations between Canada and any foreign country should be conducted. I feel that the Prime Minister reached the very epitome of insulting nonsense when he threatened that if Britain did not look out Canada would consider excluding her from the Commonwealth. His threats were almost equalled by the silly words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he threatened the Parliament of the United Kindgom with "grave consequences" if it did not do what Canada wanted.

One might well ask how the Prime Minister intends to go about excluding Britain from the Commonwealth. After all, Canada, important, vigorous and growing though she is, is just one member of the Commonwealth, with only 24 million people. The Commonwealth consists of over 40 countries with many hundreds of millions of people, approaching, I believe, a billion. What is the Prime Minister going to do as he sets about excluding Britain from the Commonwealth? Are those the same grave consequences that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has in mind? If not, what are those grave consequences, and how does he intend to inflict them on Britain? If it came to that, it is much more likely that we would be tossed out.

Do these two honourable gentlemen really imagine that the Parliament and the people of Britain can be frightened by such bombastic threats into doing something they might not wish to do? I think you know the answer to that yourselves, honourable senators, and the answer is: Of course not. Going further, I do not think that they should be asked to do more than afford simple patriation with a temporary or permanent amending formula acceptable to a substantial majority of the provinces; but whatever they may be asked to do, they cannot be frightened into doing it. Trying to frighten them only reveals the weakness of the Canadian government's position and its own immaturity.

I turn now to the subject of federalism. It is clear that some of the things proposed in the so-called Constitution Act, 1981 are contrary to the provisions of the British North America Act. Indeed, the Prime Minister does not deny that that is so. He does not deny that some of the proposals completely ignore the rights given to the legislatures of the provinces. There are some who have argued that this really does not matter. They quote Sir John A. Macdonald and George Brown, those two great and distinguished Fathers of Confederation, to show that they would have preferred not only a central government with stronger and wider jurisdiction, but, indeed, a unitary state. I do not doubt that those two distinguished gentlemen from the central part of the country did have such preferences. I do not doubt that they argued for them while the Confederation debates were going on. The fact is that able, distinguished and influential though they were, they were not able to convince the delegates from the rest of the country to accept a union of a unitary nature or anything like it. The fact that these two able gentlemen wanted a unitary state but could not get it is the clearest possible proof, I submit, that the three other original provinces could not be persuaded to yield to a central government those rights of the people which can best be protected and exercised by a level of government which is closer to the people.

● (1550)

No matter what Sir John A. Macdonald and George Brown wanted, what they had to accept is clearly set out, in the main, in sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act. As all honourable senators know, section 92 specifies the matters which come under provincial jurisdiction. Section 92 begins with the words:

> In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—

It then enumerates some 16 matters, the first of which is: "The Amendment ... of the Constitution of the Province, except as regards the Office of Lieutenant-Governor." Within the matters therein set out, each province has complete and sovereign jurisdiction, subject only to the power of reservation and disallowance which has fallen out of use anyway.

Honourable senators, there could and would have been no union or federation without leaving these enumerated matters to provincial legislatures. There had to be, and there was, acceptance of the view set out by Senator Tremblay at page 1833 of the Debates of the Senate of February 24, when he said:

> In short, the sharing of jurisdictions means that national interests are best served by assigning legislative authority to the provinces in certain matters. They are also best served in other matters when that jurisdiction belongs to the central Parliament.

I wish to give particular emphasis to one point about the division of jurisdiction between Parliament and provincial legislatures, one which I have not heard mentioned. It is that jurisdiction over all of these matters belongs to the people and not to governments, whether they be provincial governments or the Government of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith: The allocation or division of jurisdiction, as set out in the B.N.A. Act, is merely an expression of the means by which the people will exercise their sovereign authority: that is, by means of the persons they elect to the federal Parliament, in federal jurisdictions; and by means of the people they elect to the legislatures of the provinces in which they live, in provincial jurisdictions.

It is the duty of the premiers of those provinces to protect the rights of the people for which they are responsible; and they would be found wanting in their duty if they did not protect those rights.

It has been popular, and perhaps it still is, to complain that all the premiers and the provincial governments are trying to do is to hold on to, or to increase, their own power. Honourable senators, I deny that that is so; I assert that it is not so. They are protecting, for the people of their provinces, the rights of those people to deal with certain things themselves in their own legislatures, as provided by the British North America Act, in carrying out the terms agreed upon at the time of Confederation.

One has only to look at clause 31(1)(b) of the proposed resolution to know that it intends to take away from the people of the provinces their right to have their legislatures deal with the matters given to them under the British North America Act. This provision reads:

> 31. (1) This Charter applies ...
> (b) to the legislature and government of each province and to all matters within the authority of the legislature of each province.

The fact that it is being passed, if it is passed at all, by the parliament of a foreign country, does not make it any better; indeed, it makes it much worse. This is the kind of provision that could not get by the Supreme Court of Canada, if it were being passed by the Parliament of Canada, without the consent of the provinces. It is the sort of provision which would be illegal and unconstitutional if enacted by the Parliament of Canada without the consent of the provinces. There are a number of other similar provisions in the proposed British legislation which could not be enacted in Canada.

There is absolutely no doubt whatever that the Prime Minister is intending to ask the parliament of a foreign country to do what the Parliament of Canada cannot do. He is trying to avoid and evade the rights of Canadians by asking the Parliament of Great Britain to pass legislation affecting the individual rights of every Canadian, knowing full well that the Parliament of Canada cannot legally do so.

Honourable senators, you have been very patient. I have taken a good deal of your time, and I appreciate your attention. I conclude as I began, by saying again that this is not a debate about patriation of the Constitution. It is a debate about taking to another country proposed changes in the Constitution which could not legally be made in Canada. I believe in patriation—patriation with an amending formula acceptable to Parliament and to a substantial majority of the provinces, which I believe would not be hard to find. As for the other contents of this proposal, let them be dealt with in Canada by Canadians, in a way calculated to unite the country rather than to divide it.

On motion of Senator Wood, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would ask that the remainder of the items on the order paper stand.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): There is agreement on this side to forego the Question Period. However, we do not want to deprive your side of the opportunity.

Senator Frith: Speaking on behalf of prospective questioners on this side, I express their thanks for that consideration. I have just sent word to Senator Perrault that Question Period is about to be called. He will be here to answer questions, but the other ministers will not be. I will be glad to answer any questions that I can, or, alternatively, pass them along.

Honourable senators, all other items on the order paper will stand unless any senator wishes to speak to a particular item.

Before moving the adjournment, I remind honourable senators that the committee chaired by the Honourable Senator Smith is now ready to proceed with its meeting. Have the witnesses arrived yet?

Hon. G. I. Smith: I have just been informed that the witnesses are now present in the committee room, and, I would ask all members of the committee to proceed there now.

• (1600)

Senator Frith: I am sure that any other senators interested in the important matter before that committee are also welcome to attend; indeed, all honourable senators are entitled to attend.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, March 11, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

RONALD W. REAGAN
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF BOTH HOUSES

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the honour to move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault, that the Address of the President of the United States of America, Mr. Ronald W. Reagan, to members of both houses of Parliament, delivered on March 11, 1981, together with the introductory speech by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of Canada and the speeches delivered by the Speaker of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Commons, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I support the deputy leader, especially with regard to the speech of the President of the United States of America and His Honour the Speaker of the Senate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I had thought of asking Senator Flynn to second the motion, but I realized that there might be a condition or two for his total support, and, therefore, I did not do so.

Motion agreed to.

(For text of address and introductory speeches see Appendix, p. 2013.)

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report on the administration of the Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 8 of the said Act, Chapter V-7, R.S.C., 1970.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

HIS EXCELLENCY EDWARD G. LATTER—NEW ZEALAND HIGH COMMISSIONER

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, on a rather pleasant question of privilege may I draw your attention to a distinguished visitor in our gallery in the person of His Excellency Edward G. Latter, the New Zealand High Commissioner to Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Phillips: Over a pleasant lunch His Excellency told me how much he has been enjoying our country and, in particular, observing our political system. I hope that he can make more sense out of it than we can.

THE SENATE

MEMBERS—INVITATIONS TO STATE FUNCTIONS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a point of order on a motion proposed yesterday by Senator Everett. I commend him on his desire "to review, with the appropriate ministers and officials, the recommendations contained in the report of the said committee on 'The Accommodation Program of the Department of Public Works,' " and ask him if he would add, when he meets with the Minister of Public Works, a recommendation respecting the National Arts Centre, so that every honourable senator is invited to those functions that honourable senators should be invited to.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, it is beyond my authority to take such a message to the Minister of Public Works. I believe that would be the job of the government leader in the Senate.

I might say, in a personal vein, that I was absolutely appalled to learn that all members of this chamber were not invited to the gala performance at the National Arts Centre last night.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: This is a question of privilege.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the preparation of the guest list for the functions held in connection with the visit to Canada of the President of the United States was not done by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the house leader, or the government whip in this place. While it is a very complex task to draw up lists of this kind, I feel that events of importance, such as the presidential gala held last night, should include, where possible, every member of both houses of Parliament.

● (1405)

Senator Marshall: I would like to point out to the Leader of the Government that in the Table of Precedence, that famous protocol list, honourable senators are seventeenth. In view of the fact that there were 1,800 people at the gala event last night, does this mean that we were taken out of our order of precedence?

Senator Perrault: I can only say that the honourable senator may find it more profitable to direct his line of questioning to those who, in the ultimate, prepared the list.

An Hon. Senator: We can't get Mr. Trudeau here.

Senator Perrault: Hopefully, in the future the system can be greatly improved.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ADJOURN TO WASHINGTON, D.C.

Hon. George van Roggen, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which was authorized by the Senate on May 1, 1980 to continue its examination of, and report upon, Canadian relations with the United States, be empowered to adjourn to Washington, D.C., U.S.A., for the purpose of such examination.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Explain.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, as you know, the Foreign Affairs Committee has been studying Canada-United States relations for some years. We are concluding our hearings which will result in the final volume, Volume III, of our report later this year. There are some four or five influential agencies conducting certain studies in the United States. While they may not have precisely the same terms of reference, their studies and ours are along parallel lines. I am thinking of the task force set up by the President as a result of the 1979 Trade Act of the United States, whose report is required to be finalized by July of this year, under the provisions of the legislation. There is a report on the same subject by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, a report by the Canada-America Committee, and research being done by the National Governors' Association.

We have not firmed up the arrangements because we require the approval of the Senate to go to Washington, but we have made tentative arrangements to meet with those groups and, in addition, to have a joint meeting with the Subcommittee on International Trade of the Finance Committee of the United States Senate. These are the types of things we would be doing there in anticipation of preparing our final report.

As far as the committee's travel is concerned, I might say that the last time this committee went anywhere outside Ottawa was in 1973. The dates contemplated are in late April, namely, April 28 to 30.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

EAST COAST FISHERIES AND MARITIME BOUNDARY TREATIES

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Before directing my question to the Leader of the Government, I should like to say that all those who listened to the speeches delivered this morning by the President of the United States, the Prime Minister of Canada, the Speaker of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Commons were most impressed.

It does seem that the President's visit has gone a long way towards restoring a better understanding of some questions under discussion between our two countries.

My question deals with a problem which, if I am not mistaken, has not been mentioned and relates to the Law of the Sea Treaty. It seems that at the New York meeting, they were about to reach an agreement and that the U.S. government has now ruled out any possibility of agreeing to sign a treaty.

[English]

Senator Olson, I thought you were informing me of something.

Senator Asselin: He will never do that.

Senator Flynn: Well, occasionally, by accident, he might give us some information.

However, my question to the Leader of the Government—Now I hear the distant voice of my good friend, Senator Langlois. Pardon me?

Senator Langlois: I am pleased to know that you are interested in what I say.

Senator Flynn: I am always interested in what you say. You will notice that I am in a good mood today. Even Senator Guay is trying to get into the fray because I am in a good mood.

Who is asking for something? Senator Hastings, I have great admiration for you, but I do not think I should take the trouble to make any comment.

My question is: Did the Prime Minister secure from President Reagan an explanation as to why the U.S. has scuttled the treaty, and as to how long his government intends to review the treaty before, if ever, it decides to sign it?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, no recent information has been received on this point. Of course, negotiations and discussions continued until as late as this morning. The question will be taken as notice, and perhaps information can be provided tomorrow.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Despite the reports in the paper that President Reagan has told Canada that the East Coast Fisheries Treaty has been withdrawn because it could not pass the U.S. Senate, I would like to ask the leader if that was indeed the rationale given by the President for the withdrawal, and if he could confirm that the President did withdraw the treaty because it could not pass the U.S. Senate.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a body of information with respect to the East Coast Fisheries and Maritime Boundary agreements, provided to me by the Honourable Mark MacGuigan before the meetings with the President. It is rather lengthy. I would be pleased to incorporate this material in the record of today's proceedings. I think it could be helpful to honourable senators who are interested in this question.

The first question is:

> Was the Government consulted prior to the U.S. Administration's decision to abandon the East Coast fisheries agreement and ratify only the boundary settlement agreement?

The answer is:

> We were informed but not consulted. Over the past month Canadian and U.S. officials have discussed the East Coast situation on a number of occasions. On the Canadian side, we continued to urge that both agreements should be ratified, with the fisheries agreement being amended only as to its duration. On the U.S. side, they reviewed with us all the various options they thought were available to them. Late last week we were informed of Secretary Haig's recommendation to the President on this issue, and of the President's decision last Friday. As I have already made clear, this decision was a matter of profound regret and disappointment for me.

The next question is:

> Was ratification only of the maritime boundary settlement agreement one of the options reviewed with Canada?

The answer is:

> I have already indicated that U.S. officials reviewed with us all the options they thought were open to them. This does not mean that we in Canada considered all of these options valid. Our position throughout remained the same, namely that the U.S.A. should ratify both agreements, which had been negotiated as a package.

The next question is:

> Will Canada ratify the Gulf of Maine boundary settlement agreements?

The answer is:

> We will make our positions known in due course. Obviously we are determined to do everything possible to safeguard the interests of Canadian fishermen, including the vital interest in the maritime boundary.

The next question is:

> Will the failure of the fisheries agreement leave the Georges Bank fisheries unprotected in terms of conservation?

The answer is:

> That is one of our chief concerns. Without the fisheries agreement, there will be a serious threat of depletion of the scallop stocks and other fisheries resources of Georges Bank. This is one of the concerns we will be pursuing with President Reagan and Secretary Haig.

The final question is:

> Could this situation lead to a "fish war" between Canada and the U.S.A.?

The answer is:

> President Reagan has made known his intention to order the U.S. Coast Guard to forbear from the enforcement of U.S. laws against Canadian fishing vessels in all the areas claimed by Canada on Georges Bank. I believe that we would also be prepared to forbear from enforcing Canadian laws against U.S. vessels in these same areas. These actions would certainly go a long way towards avoiding conflict.

I would also hope to bring supplementary information on the situation to the chamber tomorrow, further information which may have resulted from the talks between the President of the United States and the Right Honourable the Prime Minister.

• (1415)

As I say, there is a substantial body of information stating the Canadian position which it may be helpful to have placed on the record of today's proceedings, if honourable senators would agree.

Senator Marshall: Yes, I think we would agree; but, as it is a matter of urgency, I hope you will confirm that that will be put into the Senate proceedings tomorrow.

Senator Perrault: Yes, but, as honourable senators understand, it is a delicate matter and I am waiting for a firm statement from the Secretary of State for External Affairs so that the question can be answered properly and officially tomorrow.

Hon. Lowell Murray: With great respect, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said yesterday that he has no hope at all of salvaging that treaty.

The question I should like to put to the minister is: What is the intention of the government at this point with regard to resuming discussions with the American authorities?

Senator Perrault: I can tell honourable senators that I have not yet received information on that point, and I want to make sure that the chamber is not misled.

INDUSTRY

CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT ON AUTOMOTIVE PRODUCTS

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Upon returning from a visit to Washington, the minister, in a delayed answer which he gave on July 9, 1980, addressed the following statement to me:

> It is the intention of this government to negotiate better operation of the auto pact, and while it is not desired, nor is there any intention, to seek a total renegotiation of the pact, there will be some changes to it.

Did the government pursue the negotiation of those changes yesterday, and will the Minister of State for Economic Development indicate when an announcement of those changes, which were promised eight months ago, may be expected?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, my honourable friend knows that there have been some discussions in the intervening eight-month period, and, indeed, there have been some statements of progress in those discussions during that period of time. I could gather all of those together and put them into one package, but I am sure the honourable senator is just as capable of doing that review as I am, if he wishes to.

Regarding the specific question as to on what date we will reach an official renegotiated position, that I cannot say today. I know that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has had discussions with his counterpart over the last day and a half, but I am not sure that they have reached a definitive position with respect to revising the terms and conditions of the auto pact. I think it would be fair to say at the outset that the discussions that were held over the last day and a half were not for the purpose of negotiating specific agreements other than those announced respecting NORAD and social development policy; but, certainly, the discussions accomplished a number of other useful things, such as both governments putting a number of agreements on the table, including the auto pact. Consequently, we should be able to begin in a more intense way, with the officers of the new administration, to reach a point where we can answer the two questions that were put more specifically.

Senator Charbonneau: Can the minister give us some idea of when those negotiations might be concluded to the benefit of Canadian workers? What will be the length of time? Will it be another eight months, or can the minister give us any idea at all?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I learned a long time ago that you should not try predicting the time at which someone else will make up his mind. In any event, I hardly think it fair to ask me to try to predict precisely when there will be a conclusion of negotiations that obviously involve give and take on both sides. We know very well that the auto parts industry and, indeed, the whole North American auto industry have experienced some severe difficulties in the past eight months, and even prior to that. Obviously, therefore, it would be extremely difficult for either myself or even the minister directly responsible to attempt to indicate a specific date now.

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE—FINANCING OF UNITED STATES SECTION

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. The minister is also responsible for the Northern Pipeline, and in that capacity he has assured us many times that the United States is firmly committed to the Alaska Highway gas pipeline. I believe I am correct in saying that the previous President of the United States, President Carter, sent a letter assuring the Government of Canada of the commitment of the Government of the United States to the project. I do not believe that a similar undertaking has been received from President Reagan. Did the government use the opportunity—

An Hon. Senator: Did you hear his speech this morning?

Senator Doody: Perhaps the honourable senator will bear with me. Did the minister of the government take the opportunity of the President's visit to obtain the same sort of written assurance which was given by President Carter?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, this matter was discussed during President Reagan's visit. President Reagan gave his assurance when he said earlier today:

> Our governments have already discussed one of the largest joint private projects ever undertaken by two nations—the pipeline to bring Alaskan gas to the continental United States. We strongly favour prompt completion of this project based on private financing.

The word "we" is in reference to the new administration. That assurance or commitment is at least of the same nature as the commitent given by the previous administration.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Did President Carter place the same caveat, that the pipeline was subject to private financing only, which caveat has the effect of disassociating the U.S. government from responsibility for the financing?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it should be made clear that the sponsors of the pipeline, both in Canada and the United States, have not asked either government for public underwriting of the financing of this project. There has been speculation from time to time that such underwriting may occur because of concern about cost overruns and so on. However, there is a significant incentive to keep the cost overruns at a minimum because of the rate of return. Certainly, we are confident that the Canadian section can be financed in the private sector. The qualification with regard to private financing was also made last July when we received the assurance from the previous administration and both houses of Congress.

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I would like to ask Senator Olson whether, in the discussions held by Prime Minister Trudeau and Canadian officials with President Reagan and United States officials over the past two days, the President or any of his responsible officials indicated that they are prepared to change, or to propose a change to, the existing legislation in order to allow the producers in Alaska to participate as equity holders in the financing of the United States portion of that pipeline.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can give my friend, Senator Austin, the assurance that this subject was discussed. However, I would like to wait until tomorrow, or perhaps early next week, for the official statement of the United States on this matter. I would like to make it clear, with regard to the possible amendment of equity provisions in the legislation, that it could well fall within the ambit of private financing.

• (1425)

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to ask another supplementary question. Does the expression "private financing" exclude the possibility of government guarantees?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we are getting down to some pretty fine lines now.

Senator Flynn: As far as you are concerned, they may be.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, as Senator Godfrey has pointed out, there is a difference between a guarantee and actual financing directly out of the treasury.

I think we should take the President's words at their face value. He said, "this project based on private financing." That, according to my interpretation, does not mean government underwriting or guaranteeing.

Senator Flynn: It is a fine point. It is very clear.

Senator Olson: It is very clear after I have explained it.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Given the ideological bent of the United States government as compared to this government, does the Minister of State for Economic Development feel that the President was giving a message to this government when he mentioned free enterprise?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I believe there was a great deal of substance in what the President had to say, not only earlier today but on other occasions also.

I will dismiss the clandestine attempt by my honourable friend to interpret what the "message" might be. I believe that the information and the assurances to Canada contained in that speech were both useful and beneficial to this country, in that we know, in much clearer terms, what the prospective activities of the Government of the United States are in relation to trade and other matters between our two countries.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Realizing that important and urgent matters were brought to the attention of the President of the United States, would the Leader of the Government report whether or not one other important matter, affecting both Saskatchewan and Manitoba, the Garrison Dam project, was discussed?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The important Garrison matter was discussed at length during the meetings of the President of the United States and the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. Assurance was provided by President Reagan that any recent actions with respect to Garrison in no way affect Canadian waters or the interchange of waters between Canada and the United States.

My colleague, the Honourable Bud Olson, may wish to add some remarks, since he is aware of the economic aspects which were discussed.

Senator Flynn: I doubt that he can add much.

GRAIN

RAIL TRANSPORTATION IN WESTERN CANADA

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, and refers to a press release issued by his office on March 6 which states:

> The Revelstoke situation has eased since the beginning of the year.

Would the minister explain what he was referring to when he referred to "the Revelstoke situation"? If he is referring to a labour dispute, would he outline to the Senate the exact resolution of that problem?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: He has a speech ready.

Senator Argue: —all I can say to the honourable senator is that the situation has greatly improved. In the months of January and February deliveries to the west coast totalled 1.64 million tonnes, as compared to the previous record of 1.58 million tonnes set in 1972-73.

The current situation regarding deliveries to the west coast is that in the week of March 2 to 7 there was a total of 3,452 cars. Of that number, 1,525 were CP cars and 1,901 were CNR cars.

The railways, and especially the CPR, have been concentrating on the delivery of grain in the areas in southern Alberta and southwestern Saskatchewan. These areas are now up to their "C" quotas, which means that quotas to date total some 9 bushels an acre. Therefore, the situation has greatly improved.

• (1430)

I understand the labour situation at Revelstoke with regard to the CPR has greatly improved. The question of hot coffee, hot lunches and the availability of warm food for CPR employees has been solved. With a happy and contented group of workers on the CPR, performance has gone up a great deal. It is a very satisfactory state of affairs at this time, and I want to congratulate both railroads and their employees for an excellent job being done at this time.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I should like to commend the minister on a remarkable record of delivery of grain in southern Alberta.

My supplementary question is: Has this record been achieved through the co-operation of your department, the railroads and the Wheat Board without the services of the $75,000 a year Grains Transport Co-ordinator?

Senator Argue: I do not want to apportion credit, and I do not suppose I am able to apportion it.

Hon. Lowell Murray: You will never apportion it.

Senator Argue: I have taken an interest in this, and tried to say I hope the situation will improve. The Grains Transport Co-ordinator, under the Minister of Transport, has an important role, and I believe he is fulfilling his duties very well. The railways are doing a good job, and let us say that I do not take any credit at all. I am not looking for credit.

An Hon. Senator: Oh, come on! You are just too much.

Senator Argue: The job is being well done, and I am prepared to give credit where it is due. We give credit to everybody but the opposition.

Senator Flynn: Bravo!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the minister almost, but not quite, anticipated my supplementary, which was to ask whether it is the intention of the government to appoint a successor to Dr. Horner as Grains Transport Co-ordinator, and if so, when they intend to do it. I wonder if they had Jack Horner in mind for that position.

Senator Argue: That is in the hands of the Minister of Transport, the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin. There is an acting co-ordinator at the moment, Mr. Radke, who, I believe, is doing an excellent job. I have been reading Hansard of the other place and the minister said if he could obtain the "pearl"—the best person for that position—he would name such a person. I do not know when a so-called successor will be appointed, but the job is being done. Everything is going along satisfactorily.

REPRESENTATION OF NATIONAL FARMERS UNION RE CROWSNEST RATES AND NATIONALIZATION OF CPR

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should also like to ask a question of the great fighter for economic justice for Canadian farmers, the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. We have heard a great deal about the visits to the minister of representatives of the farmers of western Canada. Would the minister care to inform this house of the way he responded to the briefs of those Canadian farmers, especially the National Farmers Union, with regard to the nationalization of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the present status of the Crowsnest freight rates?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, we both had some comments to make at the meeting with the National Farmers Union, and I will see if I can obtain a copy of the remarks I made. If I cannot, I will try to paraphrase them as accurately as I possibly can. That is not the only meeting, of course, that we had. I believe, if my memory serves me correctly, I did not comment on their preferred solution, namely, nationalization of CP Rail.

EMBARGO ON SALES TO U.S.S.R.—COMPENSATION TO FARMERS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. Some time ago the government made a commitment to pay western grain farmers for the loss of revenue because of the embargo on the sale of grain to the Soviet Union. Can the minister comment on that?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Haidasz for the attention he is giving to this important question. The question is still under active consideration. No final decision has been made.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Delayed decisions.

Senator Argue: I am still confident there will be a decision favourable to the producers, and that a payment will be made. Again, I have been reading Hansard of the other place, and the Prime Minister has made it clear that a commitment has been made by the government. It is a question of determining the exact amount of money that will be paid out to cover that commitment.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I thought it was the exact amount of the loss.

STATUS OF WOMEN

REMARKS BY MINISTER OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The minister who inexplicably retains responsibility for the status of women last week dismissed lobbying by the ad hoc committee of Canadian women for changes in the Canadian Charter of Rights by saying, "I think they are getting pretty tiresome," and, "Frankly, whatever they say at this point I couldn't care less."

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us if it is his view and that of his government not to care less about the views of the ad hoc committee?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I may be wrong, but there appeared to be a political edge to that question. I do not want to be unfair to the honourable senator.

Senator Nurgitz: Just the answers. I could try and rephrase it.

Senator Perrault: First of all, the remarks attributed to the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, who is a very effective minister, were taken out of context.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What is that?

Senator Perrault: I know the honourable senator would not wish to be unfair to anyone who serves in either this chamber or the other place. I have not seen the full text of Mr. Axworthy's alleged remarks. I do know that Mr. Axworthy, for some considerable period of time, has been engaged in extensive consultations with women's organizations in Canada. As a result, I think in the next few months we are going to see some remarkable advances for women in this country, which will be inspired in great part by his ministerial activities.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

GOVERNMENT FUNDING OF RESEARCH COUNCILS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, presidents come and presidents go, but we must fight inequity and iniquity at home all the time. I am concerned about a particular and important group in Canada which might well come into this category.

I understand that the government has advised the three important research councils of our country that two of them will receive an increase in their budget, but the other one, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada, will have its budget frozen. Considering the extreme importance of research, scholarship and education generally in that field, I would ask the Leader of the Government if he could find out if the information which I received was based upon a firm intention of the government, or whether it was one of those trial balloons. If the latter is the case, will he assure his Senate colleagues, as a friend of the social sciences, the arts and humanities, that he will oppose any such dimunition of the status of that very important body of which Senator Lamontagne and others in this chamber are important pillars?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that information will most certainly be sought. However, the record establishes clearly the fact that this government and its predecessor Liberal governments have done more to advance science, higher education and post-graduate study than any government in history.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Yes.

Senator Perrault: However, a disquieting trend has been developing with respect to the matter of financing higher education. In many provinces there has been an ever-diminishing percentage share of the cost of higher education—

Senator Flynn: Bravo!

Senator Perrault: —assumed by provincial governments.

Senator Flynn: Bravo!

Senator Perrault: Senator Flynn doesn't like to hear accurate information because he is always terrified in the face of facts. As I was saying before Senator Flynn's interruptions, there is an immediate concern about the federal portion of funding of higher education, including post-graduate studies. I think in the province of Ontario the provincial share has slipped to something around 30 per cent or less. And yet, constitutionally, education is a provincial responsibility. Higher education and grants of all sorts for post-graduate study, including science, are being reviewed. It is not an attempt by the government in any way to injure or damage higher education in this country, but an attempt to achieve a comprehensive, understandable and fair system of funding higher education and research.

Senator Flynn: Do I understand that you took the question as notice?

Senator Perrault: Yes.

● (1440)

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I hope, in the euphoria of the presidential visit and all the good news from Revelstoke, that the Leader of the Government has not misinterpreted the nature of my inquiry. I am referring to the Research Council, which is not a provincial body at all, but an important national gathering of our leading scholars in the humanities and the social sciences, upon which the educational development of the whole country depends to a considerable degree.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. I was speaking in a more general way to the question of how we finance higher education and research.

Senator Flynn: We were not asking anything about that.

AGRICULTURE

HERD MAINTENANCE ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board in connection with the Herd Maintenance Assistance Program.

Senator Flynn: Strange bedfellows.

Senator Steuart: I have received complaints from several farmers that their application for assistance has been turned down, not because of their crop failure—they are qualified in that regard—but because one of the criteria is their annual rainfall, which includes the annual snowfall.

Can the minister tell us whether that is true, that in fact several hundred—perhaps it is as high as 1,000 or 2,000—of what I would consider to be legitimate applications have been turned down on that basis; and, if so, what steps can he take to correct the situation?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, it is correct that quite a number of applications have been rejected because of snowfall and rainfall data. Of approximately 30,000 applications, as many as 4,000 have been rejected on that basis.

Ministers are giving consideration to the situation. I have had conversations with the Minister of Agriculture, who is interested in this matter, and consideration is being given to the problem. I am hopeful that a decision will be made at an early date.

This is, of course, a new program, in the sense that there has never been a program like it in the past. I believe it is correct to say that there have been some difficulties in administering the program, but it is one that is very popular. It has been well received, and to date approximately 20,000 beef producers have been paid under it. When a decision is made, I shall be happy to report to the Senate.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I am sure that a value judgment has been made, probably by some bureaucrats. However, they do not appear to have much familiarity with the snowfall situation on the prairies. I suggest that we stand a bureaucrat out there south of Regina to see how much snow he would gather on his leeward or windward side, or wherever they gather it, to judge how effective or ineffective the snowfall usually is in respect of next year's crop. One can have a tremendous snowfall on the prairies, and the people who benefit from it might be down in North Dakota.

I am sure the minister would receive support from every member representing the prairies in this chamber and the other place. I know that he is fighting to get the applications reconsidered, but no consideration seems to be given the facts as they actually exist in regard to snowfall, and the relationship between that and a good crop the following year.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, the program has attached to it a yardstick as to whether the yield of grain on a given farm is less than 80 per cent. The program does not take into account the yield of hay or fodder. As a method, I suppose, of endeavouring to outline an area where the drought was severe, officials maintained records of rainfall and snowfall from November 1, 1979 to May 31, 1980. However, it does seem that the major question is whether a producer had a crop and therefore had feed, and the question of the amount of rainfall or snowfall in the previous winter obviously did not have any particular bearing if the crop, by this definition, was a failure. Technically I am not able to say what is the correlation between winter snowfall and rainfall on the subsequent crop—

Senator Flynn: Senator Steuart will tell you.

Senator Argue: —but I would think there is not a very close correlation. I am sure there is a close correlation between summer rainfall and the size of the crop. In any event, we are considering the question of rejected applications.

[Senator Argue.]

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

EAST COAST FISHERIES AND MARITIME BOUNDARY TREATIES

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I dislike having to depend on the written and electronic media at all times regarding certain matters; therefore, I would direct a question to that great fisherman, the Leader of the Government. It is probably a fishy question. I presume there was fish on the menu for the President of the United States.

Can the Leader of the Government advise me if the matter has been discussed, up to this point in time, between the President and the Prime Minister? Are the Americans treating the subject as dead cod, or are there going to be further discussions? Are they going to destroy 10 years of work in connection with the negotiations, and is there any hope of their meeting again with our people, or is it going to be a Hollywood production, a rerun of Jaws II?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I stated earlier this afternoon that I would, with permission, incorporate a certain volume of information with respect to Canada's position on this matter. That material will appear in the record of today's proceedings.

So far as the larger question is concerned, I felt that in view of the sensitivity of this matter I would seek a formal statement from our government as a result of conversations which were proceeding even today. I feel that it is an issue where a random, ad hoc answer should not be given in the Senate. If I may take the question as notice, I will promise to bring a response.

Senator Muir: Thank you.

FINANCE

INTEREST RATES—PROFITS OF CHARTERED BANKS

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. On December 16 last, in the midst of a highly volatile period of fluctuating bank rates based upon the prime rate of the Bank of Canada, I pointed out that when the Bank of Canada prime rate increased, the chartered banks were very slow in increasing their rates to depositors on both of savings and term deposits; but when the bank rate decreased they were most rapid in dropping those rates.

The Leader of the Government, in his reply to me on January 13, said:

> The basic policy of this government has been to avoid direct intervention in the detailed price-setting mechanisms of individual industries such as the banks, but rather to rely upon policies to ensure competitive conditions in the markets. It should be noted that the Canadian banks, the trust and loan companies, the credit unions and caisses populaires are highly competitive, and this competitiveness is the surest way of keeping these institutions efficient and interest margins as low as possible.

First, I should say that I cannot regard the banks as an industry like any other in this country, because of their situation in controlling those rates for depositors to the extent that they do.

Yesterday the first quarterly reports of some of the chartered banks were made public. Although the profits for the first quarter of 1980 had been rather good, the increases for the first quarter of 1981 over 1980 are somewhat extraordinary. The increase of the number one bank, the Royal Bank, was in excess of 80 per cent over last year. The number two bank, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, had an increase of 60 per cent plus over last year; and, although the circumstances are quite different, the Bank of British Columbia, in the leader's own province, had an increase of something in the order of 225 per cent plus over the first quarter of last year.

● (1450)

With that rather long introduction, for which I apologize, I ask: Is the government now prepared to look at this situation to determine if there is an unconscionable difference between the rates of interest paid by the chartered banks to their depositors and the rates of interest charged by the Canadian chartered banks to their customers for loans, and to report those findings and any recommendations they might have for change to the Parliament of Canada?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. Certainly, the first quarter figures indicate that the banking industry may not be one of the struggling sectors of the Canadian economy.

Senator Frith: They are succeeding in their war against poverty.

Senator Perrault: It was announced in Britain yesterday that a windfall profits tax will be levied on certain bank profits in that country. While I am in no fashion suggesting that such a measure is under discussion here, I have noted the reported profit figures, as have other senators. The question is a good one, and an answer will be sought.

TRANSPORT

VIA RAIL—REPRESENTATION OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES ON BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I have a second question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, which is asked on behalf of the long-suffering travellers of the Atlantic provinces.

I have an information release from the office of the Minister of Transport for Canada, headed, "VIA Rail Board of Directors Appointments". Some 14 directors have just been appointed, one from British Columbia, one from Alberta, one from Saskatchewan, one from Manitoba, five from Ontario, four from Quebec, none from New Brunswick, one from Nova Scotia, none from P.E.I., and none from Newfoundland.

I have looked at the bona fides of the various appointees, and I find that there are no really special or different types of people among them that cannot be found very effectively, among people of great efficiency, in the Atlantic provinces of Canada. As a respresentative of the area that suffers most, I suggest, from lack of acceptable facilities for rail travel in Canada, I would urge the Leader of the Government in the Senate to inquire as to why this region has been so ignored, and as to the remedial action that might be taken to correct the situation.

Senator Flynn: Change the minister!

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it may be that the full board has yet to be named. The names provided by the Honourable Senator McElman may represent only a partial list of appointments. It could be that a further list of those who live in the Atlantic provinces is under review and future appointments will be made from that important region. Perhaps further appointments, therefore, will be made.

In any case, Senator McElman's concern will be communicated to the Minister of Transport. If the names cited by Senator McElman represent the total list of the board of directors of VIA Rail, there does appear to be somewhat of a regional imbalance.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

TRANS-BORDER POLLUTION PROBLEMS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate in connection with pollution?

In the special briefings made available in Washington, prior to the President's visit to Canada, it was indicated that the United States was unlikely to change its position on pollution problems affecting Canada, and that Washington will continue to work within the guidelines of the pollution agreement signed with Ottawa last summer.

In view of all the discussion that has taken place on this subject in Canada recently, I wonder if it is the opinion of the government, particularly after the recent presidential visit, that Washington is continuing to work within the guidelines of the pollution agreement that was made last summer.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this question was on the agenda for discussion between the President and the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, and I do not want to relay anything but the latest information on the subject. It may be that my colleague, the Honourable Senator Olson, has certain updated information which is not available through my other channels.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the President referred to matters of environmental concern to both countries in the speech he made earlier today. It may be that we can make a more specific and more detailed statement about that, but I would expect that after the re-affirmation, or statement, of principles, in applying resources to clear this up, it may be some days before bilateral discussions between the cabinet officials responsible for this matter, on both sides of the border, can produce a more specific and detailed plan of action.

Senator Roblin: If I may ask a supplementary question to either minister, my interest in the matter is underlined by the fact that the Environmental Protection Agency in the United States has recently issued proposed revisions in that country's Clean Air Act, which may affect Canada. They have given the public in the United States 30 days to make their views known with respect to that matter. Is it the position of the Government of Canada that these new proposals respecting environmental protection in the United States do not affect us? Or, if it is their position that they do affect us, how can that be reconciled with the statement the minister has given us?

Would the minister be prepared, in any case, to tell the Senate whether it is the intention of the government to make representations to the Government of the United States with respect to announcements of policy that have already been made in that country, and which probably affect us?

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, I think that my friend can recall what was said, not only this morning by the President of the United States but also in other communications during the past day and a half, to the effect that the Americans acknowledge and respect the fact that the question of clean air and the reduction of pollution emitted into the air affects both countries. That is restating things that were recognized and said a long time ago.

The new administration have given us some indication that they want to take a few days to assess some of the action that is being taken, and, indeed, the amount of trans-border pollution, for the benefit of their own clean air standards and requirements. It seems to me that we should wait until they have made that assessment.

I want to say, however, as the Leader of the Government has, that we will ask for a more detailed explanation and provide it to the Senate as soon as possible.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am really concerned lest my honourable friend be disappointed in this matter, because, regardless of the assurances he thinks he has, it is quite clear that the efforts the Government of the United States is going to make in this matter are considerably reduced, some reports say by 50 per cent, in terms of dollars, so it seems to me that it would be absolutely necessary for the government to decide whether or not it wishes to protest this matter and to enter its views. If it decides not to do so, then it should tell the people of Canada why not. If it decides it is going to, then I think it should tell the people of Canada what it is going to say.

Senator Olson: I think also, honourable senators, that we need to have some more specific indications from the Government of the United States before we say what we are going to do or decide, what degree of protest we are going to make, or carry out any of the other suggestions that have been made.

[Senator Olson.]

• (1500)

Senator Roblin: May I ask a final question? When will the minister be able to report to the house the government's policy on this matter?

Senator Olson: As soon as possible.

ENERGY

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—POSSIBLE IMPOSITION OF COUNTERVAILING DUTIES ON CANADIAN EXPORTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised on March 4 by Senator Flynn concerning the National Energy Program.

I would like to reiterate an earlier answer given to Senator Asselin. The Canadian government is confident that our National Energy Program honours and is in full accord with our international obligations and commitments. Furthermore, I can assure the honourable senator that no country has initiated or given notice that it intends to levy countervailing duties against our country as a result of this program.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I ask a supplementary question respecting the energy matter that was raised by the minister? Is it the intention of the minister to make any statement about the Canadian energy program—I forget the correct name of it—

Senator Olson: The National Energy Program.

Senator Roblin: —the National Energy Program? Thank you. Does the minister intend to make any statement with respect to that matter in the context of the discussions between the President and the Prime Minister?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think within a few days there will possibly be a statement made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I will make an inquiry. If that is so, I will bring it to the Senate as quickly as I can, because it was acknowledged that there were some discussions on the matter.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

DISCUSSION OF CANADIAN ENERGY AND FOREIGN INVESTMENT POLICIES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I have a second delayed answer in response to a question asked by Senator Asselin on February 19 with respect to Canada-U.S. relations. I would ask that the answer be taken as read.

(The answer follows:)

> I understand that the U.S. government is concerned that the Canadian government implement the National Energy Program in full accord with its international obligations and commitments.
> I would like to assure honourable senators that the federal government is confident that the National Energy Program does indeed honour these obligations and the government has informed the U.S. of our commitment in this area.

There have been a series of exchanges between the two governments on the subject of the program. The federal government has left open the channels for communication, and is prepared to discuss U.S. concerns.

With regard to the honourable senator's questions concerning the Auto Pact he should know that last year formal consultations were requested under Article IV of the Auto Pact. A meeting was held in Washington in June between the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Honourable Herb Gray, and the U.S. Trade representative of the day, Governor Reuben Askew.

Since that time consultations have continued at the official level. They have dealt not only with Auto Pact issues but also with questions such as offshore import penetration and the effects on the North American industry of the trend towards a "world car." Once the new administration has had time to examine the issues we expect that consultations will continue.

FINANCE

EXCHANGE VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The final delayed answer I have is in response to a series of questions raised on February 17 by Senator Doody which concerned the exchange rate and the level of inflation. I would ask that the answer be taken as read.

(The answer follows:)

A major factor behind the current level in the Canadian dollar, that has emerged from time to time over the past year, has been the course of short-term interest rates in the United States. These have been very volatile and the Canadian dollar has tended to weaken when U.S. interest rates have moved up rapidly. In the conduct of monetary policy, the Bank of Canada has tried to steer a middle course, moderating excessive pressures in both the money market and the foreign exchange market.

The honourable senator also referred to a statement that appears in the budget background paper on the medium-term prospects for the Canadian economy. There, it is noted that for the purposes of the projections, made at a time when the dollar was around the 86 cent level, the Canadian dollar is assumed to average slightly more than U.S.$.86 in 1980 and U.S.$.875 in 1981. As noted in that document these are technical assumptions used in producing the projections; they should not be interpreted as forecasts nor as targets.

It is not government policy to attempt to fix or achieve a particular value for the Canadian dollar; this would prevent the exchange rate from performing its essential role of promoting adjustment in the balance of payments. Official operations in the foreign exchange market are confined to promoting orderly conditions, which itself promotes adjustment. As I noted earlier, over the past years U.S. interest rates have fluctuated within a wide range. These fluctuations can have a disruptive impact on the exchange rate, and the Bank of Canada has had to take this into account in its conduct of monetary policy.

With regard to the honourable senator's questions concerning the rate of inflation, in 1980 it has turned out to be somewhat higher than predicted in the October budget. The inflation outlook for 1981 has also deteriorated somewhat. This has happened because of the larger than expected increases in food prices and the prices of imported goods from the U.S. I might add that the U.S. has also experienced a rate of inflation higher than expected. Another factor contributing to this deterioration in our inflation outlook is the relative weakness of the Canadian dollar in the face of rapidly rising U.S. interest rates.

Our government believes it would be a mistake to use stop-gap ad hoc measures to suppress inflation temporarily; what is needed is a long-term policy to tackle the inflation problem. The October budget established such a policy in the form of expenditure and monetary restraint and a reduction of the deficit over time.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

DEPUTY MINISTER—ALLEGATIONS BY NATIONAL INDIAN BROTHERHOOD

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on November 18 Senator Nurgitz raised a question—

Senator Flynn: What was the date?

Senator Perrault: November 18, 1980—yes, only last year. Senator Nurgitz raised a question concerning a reference to the Deputy Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development by the President of the National Indian Brotherhood quoted in the press.

I have reviewed the press report and have discussed the issue with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The comment appears to have been rhetorical in nature and does not require action.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

VISIT TO CANADA—PROPOSED AGENDA

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Murray on March 5 concerning the American officials accompanying President Reagan to Ottawa. I would be pleased to incorporate in today's record, a list of those who visited Canada with the President, if that is satisfactory.

(The answer follows:)

Alexander M. Haig, Jr., Secretary of State

Donald T. Regan, Secretary of the Treasury

Malcolm H. Baldridge, Secretary of Commerce

James A. Baker, III, Chief of Staff

Michael K. Deaver, Deputy Chief of Staff

Richard V. Allen, Assistant to President for National Security Affairs

Martin Anderson, Assistant to President for Policy Development

William Brock, U.S. Special Trade Representative

Myer Rashish, Undersecretary Designate for Economic Affairs

Lawrence S. Eagleburger, Assistant Secretary for European Affairs

Ambassador Rozanne L. Ridgway

Richard J. Smith, U.S. Chargé d'Affaires

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

OIL COMPANY PRICING PRACTICES—INQUIRY BY RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES COMMISSION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked by Senator Flynn just a short time ago, March 5, concerning the investigation into oil company pricing practices.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Yes, and I am interested.

Senator Perrault: With respect to the appointment of counsel, the Honourable Leader of the Opposition seems to be under the impression that when this matter was referred to the Attorney General it was done pursuant to subsection 15(1) of the Combines Investigation Act to determine whether prosecutions were warranted. That is not what happened. The case was referred pursuant to section 13 of that act to appoint counsel to assist the director in his inquiry. Senator Flynn was minister at the time a number of outside counsel were appointed pursuant to section 13. These appointments have since been terminated. They served their purpose.

Senator Flynn: May I ask a supplementary question about the answer I received with regard to the referral of the matter of the oil companies to the Attorney General? What kind of assistance was the director seeking, and what kind of assistance did he receive? Whether it is in connection with section 13 or any other section of the act, what was the use of asking the Attorney General to appoint counsel?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that supplementary information will be sought quickly.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—STATEMENT BY SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Macquarrie on March 2, 1981, concerning the re-export of Canadian arms.

There are strict controls regulating the export of Canadian military goods to other countries, including the restriction of arms sales to countries that are at war.

However, military goods are treated no differently than other goods once they reach the country of destination. That is to say that Canada seeks no extraterritorial control over the re-exportation of Canadian goods to other countries.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

FUNDING BY PRIVATE SECTOR

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, on March 5 the Honourable Senator Phillips asked a question about the financing of the Farm Credit Corporation and the intention of that company to seek certain quantities of private capital.

I can say that the Honourable Eugene Whelan had indicated earlier in the House of Commons that it was the intention of the government to introduce legislation which would allow this to happen.

In response to the question raised by Senator Phillips I have some information supplied to me by Mr. Rolland P. Poirier, chairman of the Farm Credit Corporation Canada. Perhaps I might read that reply.

It is necessary for the FCC to obtain additional funding to be an effective element in the national long-term agricultural development strategy. Net funds provided by the CRF from 1977-78 to 1980-81 have averaged $290 million, which is below the $300 million approved in 1975-76 and 1977-78. The FCC has helped fewer farmers as its cash requirements have not reflected the impact of inflation. In 1974-75, FCC made 8,093 loans and only 4,700 in 1980-81. In 1973 and 1975, FCC extended 72 per cent of the total long-term credit extended in those years and this is now down to 31 per cent in 1980-81.

With the authority to borrow from the private sector, the FCC could more effectively meet the long-term credit demands of that farming sector which it has a mandate to serve. This would in the long run reduce the pressures on the demand for CRF funds. It could also allow retiring farmers the facilities to invest in FCC.

Based on the analysis of that portion of demand for long-term farm credit which it has a mandate to serve, the FCC should extend 45 per cent of the annual amount of long-term farm credit extended.

The funds raised in the private sector would be done with "Agent of Her Majesty" status. The move to private sector funding would be done gradually, and it is estimated that by 1985-86, about 60 per cent of the FCC's annual cash requirement could be borrowed from the private sector.

The cost of funds raised from the private sector would be approximately one-half per cent above the cost of CRF funding of comparable term. The interest rate charged on funds borrowed from the private sector would be a weighted average of CRF and non-CRF borrowing of the appropriate term to which a margin of not less than one per cent would be added. This would result in interest rates to the farmer of one-half to one percentage point above the current formula rates.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I appreciate the information supplied by the Honourable Senator Argue. I am surprised that a government that has billions of dollars with which to buy oil companies has no funds to support the primary producers of this country.

• (1510)

I know that in his reply the Honourable Senator Argue tactfully avoided that part of my question. Again I would ask him to explain why it is necessary to invest so heavily in oil companies. Perhaps the Minister of Energy would like to replace John Paul Getty, except using taxpayers' funds rather than his own; but I should like to have some indication of why so much money is available for the purchase of oil companies when so little is available to support the primary producers.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I do not accept the premise of the question of the honourable senator. I think it is fair to say that in the operation of Petro-Canada and other such companies there has been a mixture of capital from the public sector and loans obtained by Petro-Canada in the private sector—its own borrowings.

However, the Government of Canada does support the Farm Credit Corporation with the idea that ample funding should be made available to it. The suggestion has been made by the Minister of Agriculture that part of that funding should come from the private sector.

In the long run the main question will be whether the Farm Credit Corporation has sufficient capital to do its job and to make that capital available to farmers at reasonable interest rates. I believe the indication is that those rates will be relatively good in relation to private rates on capital that may be available.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, as I understood the reply of the honourable minister, the interest rate would be approximately one-half to 1 per cent above that of the CRF fund. If I am wrong in that, I am sure the honourable minister will correct me. Frankly, I rather doubt that this will work, but perhaps I might put my question this way: If it will work for the Farm Credit Corporation, why would it not work for the CMHC or the NHA funds? They could then also be reduced.

Senator Argue: I hardly think I need to go into that. If it works for the Farm Credit Corporation I guess it will stand on that ground.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Just as a matter of clarification, did I understand the minister to say that Petro-Canada avails itself of sources of private as well as of public financing?

Senator Argue: I will turn that question over to our energy expert.

Senator Murray: I am sorry, but I thought I distinctly heard the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board say that, effectively, Petro-Canada goes to the private markets for financing as well as going to the public treasury.

Senator Flynn: He doesn't know what he is talking about.

Senator Murray: Perhaps the minister or his colleague would clarify that statement.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, Petro-Canada has not gone to private financing for any equity.

Senator Flynn: As yet.

Senator Olson: But I do think they have acquired some financing in debt in the private sector.

Senator Flynn: Are you sure?

JUDGES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-34, to amend the Judges Act and certain other acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to move the second reading of this bill to amend the Judges Act. In introducing and explaining it to honourable senators I wish to make three main points. First, I should like to speak about the purpose of the bill, indicating the wrong it seeks to right; second, to give some brief historical notes; and, third, to comment on the modalities that are set out in the bill for achieving its purpose.

Honourable senators, Bill C-34 may seem to be a mere matter of innocuous administration, but it is really of fundamental importance to the system of government we enjoy in this country. As a matter of fact, honourable senators may remember that the Judges Act is the subject of a separate section of the British North America Act imposing on us as parliamentarians the responsibility of attending to judges' salaries. In this country we have the benefit of a judicial and legal system second to none in the world. Our judiciary is endowed with standards of efficiency, competence, compassion and independence that are absolutely essential to the enjoyment of the rights and privileges of all persons in Canada.

However, federally-appointed judges have felt in recent years, I believe with justification, that their interests were being neglected and that their contributions to the character of Canadian life were being ignored, that their independence was being eroded and that, perhaps in the future, the quality of the federally-appointed bench might become diluted.

Those perceptions of the judges have been drawn from the mere fact of the inaction of Parliament in not keeping their salaries even modestly abreast of the times. Relative to other groups in society, their purchasing power has steadily diminished, particularly since 1977. The judges, understandably, have begun to feel that Parliament is not living up to the constitutional responsibility I have referred to, to provide for their salaries and benefits, and, feeling inhibited by the ethical constraints which prevent their active involvement in the political process, they are equally, clearly, suffering from a resultant strong feeling of frustration.

For a long time the spirit of judicial detachment and propriety, of course, overrode such feelings. But it is fair to say that over the last few years there has been good reason, at least theoretically, to fear even for judicial independence, because of these conditions. Of course, the same inadequacies in salary levels can, and do, affect the process of appointment to the bench unless they are put right.

The bill before us, honourable senators, seeks to restore to their proper levels the salaries of federally-appointed judges. It seeks as well to establish a process of salary adjustment for the future to ensure that there will be no recurrence of the conditions I have referred to, and which have prevailed for the last few years.

Honourable senators, I would ask you, when you are considering this bill, to give careful consideration to the statistics that relate to the purchasing power of judges' salaries, because since 1975 the federally-appointed judges have received salary increases totalling only 7.5 per cent.

Let me refer to the industrial composite index for the same period. In the same period the industrial composite index—and honourable senators will remember that this index measures the increases in income of all occupations—rose by over 50 per cent as compared with 7.5 per cent for judges. In 1977 and in 1978 the judges received increases of $2,000 each year, which were subject to the Anti-Inflation Act. This bill will finally give the judges their first increase since the anti-inflation controls were established. Even so, the raises for that period which are proposed in the bill are in the order of 21 per cent, as compared with 50 per cent.

• (1520)

The figures speak for themselves and, if anything, the amounts proposed are modest. I have before me a table which covers the salary increases for superior court judges since 1975. Beside lines designated 1975, 1977, 1978, 1979 and 1980 the actual salaries are shown. The percentage increases are 3.8 per cent, 3.7 per cent, 11.4 per cent and 10.2 per cent for a total of 32.1 per cent, as compared to the percentage increases of all occupations in Canada which are 24.81 per cent, 5.96 per cent and so on. In the same period the consumer price index went up by 52 per cent and the industrial composite, which measures the income of all other occupations, went up by 57.49 per cent.

I ask leave to have this table printed in Hansard so that honourable senators may have an opportunity to study the figures.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The table follows:)

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Will you allow a question?

Senator Frith: Yes, Senator Asselin.

Senator Asselin: Does this composite index include the salaries of such other professional categories as members of the House of Commons and the Senate? Is it a comparative study that you are referring to when you quote a series of figures?

Senator Frith: The figures I have here only serve to compare consumer price index salaries with industrial composite index salaries, which take into account the incomes of all the other occupations, except some special vocational or professional occupations.

[English]

Is there another question?

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: I do not have a question; I merely wish to speak to the bill which the honourable senator has introduced.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am introducing and sponsoring this bill and, of course, it is open for debate to all honourable senators after I am finished.

Senator Lawson: I thought you were finished.

Senator Frith: As to the second portion of my observations which, as honourable senators will recall, deals with the history, the government has received representations on judges' salaries from a number of groups. When I say "the government" I refer to the present Liberal administration and the previous Conservative administration. First in time was the report of the Casgrain committee of the Canadian Bar Association which came out in August 1978. As internal increases from 1979-80 the committee recommended increases of $5,000 for each of those years.

Then came the Dorfman committee, which was appointed by the then Minister of Justice. It reported in November 1978 with salary recommendations of $3,500 in each year for the superior court puisne judges, with additional amounts for other judges. Finally, representations were received from the Canadian Judges Conference in the spring of 1980, after Senator Flynn, who was then the distinguished Minister of Justice, indicated to the judges that he intended to implement the Dorfman recommendations.

Senator Lamontagne: Oh, oh.

Senator Frith: What is the "Oh, oh" for?

Senator Flynn: It is because you are copying Senator Perrault by referring to me as "the distinguished Senator Flynn."

Senator Frith: I am using the word "distinguished" in this context both advisedly and sincerely. There is certainly no question whatever about the distinction of Senator Flynn on this matter because he took it as a particular priority during his administration, and gave it a great deal of attention, to the appreciation of all those concerned with this long-standing problem.

Then the Canadian Judges Conference, to which I just referred, proposed increases of $7,500 for superior court puisne judges and $8,500 for the judges of the county courts and district courts, in 1979 and 1980. The judges expressed the view that the Dorfman proposals, even when taken as an element in a generally attractive compensation package, were quite outdated by the spring of 1980. I believe that Senator Flynn essentially agreed with that position. I make my remarks with regard to Senator Flynn because to some extent we are justified in calling this bill the "Flynn bill." Admittedly, it is only half of the "Flynn loaf" because the committee in the other place divided the bill, and the elements dealing with pensions remain for further study.

Senator Lamontagne: The Flynn-Frith formula.

Senator Frith: Senator Lamontagne refers to this as the Flynn-Frith formula. I accept that partnership volontiers.

With regard to the modalities, there are certain matters that follow automatically from the salary adjustment mechanism that has been proposed. The adjustment mechanism is certainly one of the most important elements that I have seen in the administration of judicial affairs. It is basically the same as the escalator clause which we in Parliament enjoy, the concept of which is intended to enhance the independence of the judiciary by removing judicial compensation from the give-and-take of the political process to the extent consistent with the principles of parliamentary democracy and ministerial responsibility for the expenditure of public funds.

This is a most beneficial step and, obviously, the success of the adjustment mechanism hinges on the adequacy of the salary base on which it is to operate. If the salary base is too low, the annual adjustments will not be able to contain the pressure to revise the salaries that will build up in the short term. The salary base must be satisfactory to avoid a repetition of a period of judicial malaise followed by legislation which puts the judges' financial affairs in the forefront of the public mind. In my estimation the bill provides a salary base which is appropriate, which will keep judicial salaries aligned with inflationary tendencies and which will ease the complexity of the judicial compensation study which will take place in 1983.

As honourable senators will notice, as well as the base salary there is included in the bill a mechanism which will have an adjusting effect, just as we have with regard to parliamentary salaries, and a review process which will occur every three years.

A number of allowances provided for the judiciary also are being increased by very modest amounts for the first time since the allowances were established. A new accountable allowance to meet the special expenses of the judicial office is being provided. This allowance is for such things as robes and any expenses which go with the office.

Clarification of certain elements of the judicial annuity system will also be achieved. On the whole, the bill rationalizes the structure of the compensation package of the federally appointed judges.

● (1530)

As I have mentioned, outside of the legislative process an advisory committee is being reconstituted by the Minister of Justice to re-examine the post-retirement security arrangements found in the Judges Act.

In short, honourable senators, we have before us what I believe is a much needed bill, essential to our social well-being. I submit that the bill, as presented to us now, should not be considered as very controversial, and that its enactment and proclamation are overdue in responding to the objectively demonstrable needs of our judges. I hope honourable senators, that our responsibilities, under section 100 of the British North America Act, and the long history of attempting to adjust this unsatisfactory situation will result in speedy and non-partisan passage of this bill.

If honourable senators agree, I shall ask that this bill be referred, for study, to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I should also like to observe that, while the principles of the bill are very clear—and I hope that I have exposed those principles—some of the mechanics are matters which honourable senators may wish to study and raise questions about in committee.

Honourable senators, I commend this bill for favourable consideration.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I move adjournment of the debate.

If Senator Lawson wants to speak on this matter he can do so tomorrow, as I will yield to him. We had agreed that other matters should be dealt with after the debate on the Constitution, and if this debate continues it will involve postponing the debate on the Constitution.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Before the motion is put, may I ask a question? In an extract from the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons of February 19, 1981 certain changes in this bill are referred to, including those related to clauses 29 and 31. However, the printed bill before us ends at clause 28. Could the sponsor of the bill satisfy my curiosity in this respect?

Senator Frith: I cannot give the details now, but the clauses were renumbered because of the changes made. If required, I can provide the honourable senator with the specific renumbering.

Senator Hicks: That is fine.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I cannot understand the argument of Senator Godfrey who is moving the adjournment of the debate. There was no order of the Senate that we would deal with the constitutional debate before second reading of this bill. I said that we would deal with the question as it came before us.

In any event, if the honourable senator wants to take responsibility for delaying the passage of this bill, for once it will not be my fault.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I ask Senator Godfrey to withdraw the motion to adjourn the debate, in the hope that the committee will study this matter tomorrow. The honourable senator might want to speak to this matter on third reading.

Senator Godfrey: I withdraw my motion to adjourn the debate.

Senator Flynn: I yield to Senator Lawson.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I will not delay the matter, since I have only a few brief comments to make.

At the outset, I congratulate Senator Frith on the excellent presentation he has made in outlining the details and the impact of the bill. I will shorten what I have to say by identifying with Senator Frith's remarks, as far as he has gone, in support of the legislation.

As one who negotiates annual increases for groups all across the country, I believe this is something which is very long overdue. If there are any errors in the bill, they are not on the side of being overly generous. This is a modest increase, when you consider the length of time since the last increase in judges' salaries. I certainly want to support the legislation.

However, the area of my concern is the second phase which deals with the proposal to equalize and bring equity and fairness to pensions and pension payments as they affect judges. Neither this government nor the previous government, but an earlier government formed a study group which studied this matter to death in order to bring equity and fairness to the different rates of contribution by judges across the country. The "Flynn" bill—when Senator Flynn was Minister of Justice—was based on satisfaction with that study.

A study was also conducted by the Dorfman Commission which resulted in a bill which included ending these inequities and the unfairness which existed. Unfortunately, Senator Flynn's government tripped on its own sword before it was able to make that bill law.

I understand that the Honourable Jean Chrétien gave a solemn undertaking to the judges, at one meeting, that that inequity and unfairness would be removed, and that it would be encompassed in this legislation. However, the bill now comes before us without those provisions, and we are asked to refer it to committee for further study.

In the name of all the judges who are going to go on pension sometime, I would say that we need no further studies. Since it comes to us in this fashion, and since I believe the government gave a very firm undertaking, if it is not to be considered guilty of a serious breach of faith on this very important issue we must have some assurance that this study group is not just a method of setting the matter aside and prolonging this unfairness and inequity for years to come.

I will not be able to attend the committee meeting in the morning, but I should like some assurance—while I support the legislation—that this is not just a manoeuvre to set the bill aside and ignore this inequitable situation which has gone on for so long, and that it will be seriously studied and brought back before Parliament.

Other than that, I congratulate Senator Frith for his excellent presentation, and I hope I have not delayed the matter too long.

Senator Frith: Thank you for your intervention and comment.

Senator Asselin: Are you closing the debate?

Senator Frith: No, I am not closing the debate. I am dealing with the point raised by Senator Lawson.

I agree with what the honourable senator has said. My personal opinion is that the aspect of the judges' situation which he has referred to is, if possible, even more pernicious than the delays concerning the salary aspect. I believe that the differences he refers to are very undesirable, since the situation can arise where two or three judges may be sitting in a court, and one judge, for no other reason than the date of his appointment, may be making several hundred dollars a month more than his companion sitting right next to him. We can imagine what effect that has on them. I believe that the judges have shown remarkable restraint, self-discipline and objectivity in their response to that situation.

I wish I could give assurance that we will see a bill covering this second part following closely on the heels of the first part. However, I cannot give that assurance. Certain parties in the other place were very anxious to give further parliamentary study to that aspect of the matter, in spite of the fact that studies had already been done. The government decided, without backing up one inch from its support of both elements, to get on with this part of the matter rather than have it held back by the other part.

As far as I am aware, the government is still committed to the total package.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Is there anything to prevent the committee from bringing in amendments or recommendations along the lines suggested by Senator Lawson on this matter of pensions?

Senator Frith: I do not think there is any technical reason why the Senate committee could not propose an amendment, except, of course, that it is a money matter. That would be enough to question this process in itself, but it would also mean that you would delay this first part.

Senator Rowe: Perhaps I should preface my remark by saying that, inasmuch as this is a money bill—and I understand the restrictions and prohibitions attached to any recommendation that our committee may make in that connection—could our committee bring in some recommendations or amendments along the line suggested by Senator Lawson?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, in my opinion, no.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Frith has mentioned how interested I was in the problems we are discussing today during the short period of time I was responsible for the Department of Justice. First, I would like to tell him that I agree with his explanations on the bill, and that I congratulate him on the clarity of his statement. I can also tell him that I appreciate the problems which remain unsolved.

First of all, there were the salary problems. I had suggested that the government approve the recommendation in the Dorfman Report which provided for an increase of $3,500 retroactive to April 1, 1979, plus a second similar increase retroactive to April 1, 1980, or $7,000 for the entire period. The bill provides for an increase of $15,000, which is $7,000 more for those two years. As Senator Frith has said, the salaries will also be indexed as of April 1, 1980, which means that the salaries of judges will still have to be readjusted as soon as this bill is passed.

● (1540)

I had suggested that the Dorfman Report be endorsed, first of all, for reasons of economy. Second, because I wanted to settle the pension issue with respect to the contributions from judges appointed after February 1, 1975. I wanted to solve this problem which involved the payment of a rather substantial amount of money. I considered it was more important to settle this contribution business than to grant any larger increase. In any case, as concerns salaries, I would rather be overly generous than not, as Senator Lawson said earlier, because I have always considered that our judiciary could serve as a model for the rest of the western or free world. We are very lucky to have such a good Canadian judiciary.

Senator Frith: Exactly so.

Senator Flynn: I believe that the independence of the judiciary is a principle which must concern us deeply, and if we have to be overly generous in order to maintain this independence, I shall never hesitate in that respect.

The second matter is that of subsequent readjustments. Under section 100 of the British North America Act, it is of course the responsibility of Parliament to decide upon the salaries of judges appointed by the federal authorities. I believe that the idea was that judges should not be left at the mercy of the executive. This is an excellent principle, but it stirs up problems since the matter must be referred to Parliament, and this calls for a debate in the House of Commons, and we know that all sorts of opinions concerning judges may be voiced in the other place. In this chamber, I do not know why exactly, we seem to be somewhat more respectful of the judiciary than are the members of the other place. For one thing, our judges cannot defend themselves against the criticisms which are levelled at them. Of course, there will always be judges who are not quite up to their responsibilities or even not up to them at all. But this is a problem which should be treated differently than that of the salaries of our judges who, on the whole, do a good job and fulfil their duties adequately. The Canadian Judicial Council are the people involved with this problem.

As far as salary adjustments are concerned, the bill which was printed and which was to be introduced shortly after the Clark government was defeated in December 1979, did not provide for indexing. However, we indicated at that time that a general procedure would be developed to deal with all salaries under federal jurisdiction, including those of senior officials and members of Parliament. This bill provides for the indexing system which applies to members of Parliament, and I agree with that. I would have heartily agreed in 1979, even though the government of the day wanted to deal with the problem in a much broader way. Moreover, every third year the government will have to appoint a board to inquire, independently of indexing, into the adequacy of salaries paid to judges. However, from that point of view—

Senator Frith: With authority to make recommendations?

Senator Flynn: Yes, of course. It cannot be otherwise unless section 100 of the British North America Act is amended. It is always up to Parliament to decide. A board appointed by the Minister of Justice could not impose a policy on Parliament.

As far as pensions are concerned, up until 1975 judges were not contributing towards their pensions. Besides, pensions were not automatically awarded under the law, and this was a discretionary issue which rested with the Governor in Council. Sure enough, a rather fair system was evolved by which a judge who retired at age 75 was entitled to a pension, as was his widow subsequently—the retiring judge being entitled to two thirds and the widow or widower to one half—but I will deal with this later on.

At the discretion of the Governor in Council, the same treatment was provided, or was at least possible, in the case of a judge who died after only a few months on the bench, or who became invalid.

The widow of a judge was entitled to the pension already mentioned, and a judge who left the bench because of illness would receive a two-thirds pension. That, however, was discretionary. There was also a provision under which a judge who had been on the bench for 15 years and who was at least 65 years of age was automatically entitled to his pension. But all the rest of it was in a state of uncertainty, once again owing to the problem of the Governor in Council discretionary powers. But legislation was introduced in 1975 to deal directly with the salaries of judges. It provided for the last increases mentioned, with the result that a Superior Court justice now earns $57,000, if I am not mistaken. At that time the legislation had nothing to do with the issue of pension contributions, it merely adjusted salaries. I remember that when the bill was before the Senate there were congratulations for the Minister of Justice because he had turned down the suggestion made by the NDP, probably by Mr. Stanley Knowles, to levy a contribution from judges for their pension. It was considered that a contribution ought not to be levied because the pension came with the appointment to the bench. But what is very strange indeed is that in December 1965 we were asked to deal with Bill C-52 after we had passed the bill on judges' salaries in April. I think it was Senator Asselin who at the time extended to the Minister of Justice the congratulations I referred to a moment ago.

● (1550)

As I was saying, in December, on the last day before the adjournment for the holiday recess, we were asked to adopt Bill C-52, the main thrust of which was to remove from all statutes concerning pensions any element of discrimination againt women. This bill had been considered in committee but, as far as I know and as far as I can recall, nobody before the committee and certainly not before the Senate when it dealt with Bill C-52 on the last day before the Christmas recess, nobody, I repeat, had pointed out that the proposed legislation contained an amendment to the Judges Act whereby any judge appointed since February 1, 1975 would have to pay a pension contribution equal to 6 per cent of his or her salary.

We passed the bill on December 19, 1975, if I am not mistaken, not even aware that we were at the same time amending the Judges Act and imposing pension contributions on any judge appointed after February 1, 1975.

Naturally, a certain number of judges had been appointed in the meantime and all of a sudden they realized that they were being asked to pay 6 per cent—retroactive to the date of their appointment, if you please. As Senator Frith said earlier, that, of course, created two classes of judges: those who did not contribute towards their pension and others who paid the 6 per cent. As Senator Frith pointed out, on $70,000 it does make a difference of $4,200 a year or $350 a month. That situation has stirred up a number of problems. The strangest aspect of that provision of Bill C-52 is that while it imposed a 6 per cent contribution on judges appointed since February 1, 1975, it did not provide for any compensation nor any right to a pension. That remained the prerogative of the Governor in Council. A judge could contribute for 10 or 12 years, but if he was not 65 years of age nothing was provided for a pension.

Senator Asselin: Each case should be dealt with by the Governor in Council.

Senator Flynn: Yes. There was no relationship between the provisions concerning the judges' pensions and their contributions.

It is therefore because of this problem that when, with the help of departmental officials, I drafted the bill which was to be introduced in the House in December 1979, I realized that we had better go back to the older system whereby the pension entitlement was part of the appointment, without contributions. I intended therefore to abolish the contribution system for the judges appointed after February 1, 1975, and provide for a refund of contributions paid.

Of course, there was not general agreement on this, but such was the government's decision. Then, our government was defeated, and as Senator Frith mentioned, the new government or the new Minister of Justice, Mr. Chrétien, who succeeded me, adhered to the same point of view which met the opposition that we know of.

On the other hand, while we were considering returning to the former non-contributory system, we had submitted that there had to be an obligation on the government's part to pay a pension in some cases, instead of relying on its discretionary powers as had been the custom until then. If you look at clause 16, you will find that the new section 23 substitutes "shall grant" for "may grant" an annuity equal to two-thirds of the salary. It has become an obligation.

Even with this change in the pension system, we are still faced with the problem of judges who contribute and others who do not. On the other hand, most judges who do contribute are now getting a specific right in that, if they become incapacitated at any time after their appointment, they become eligible for a pension; also, if they die at any time after their appointment, a pension is paid to their widow; also, they become entitled to a two-thirds pension when they reach age 65, after sitting on the bench for 15 years, or to a full pension when they retire at age 75 after sitting on the bench for at least 10 years. Of course, in such cases, this pension is also paid to their widows.

At least, it can be said that those who contribute are entitled to something now, except that the judge who retires after having contributed for 10 years because he no longer wants to sit as a judge, or for other than medical reasons is not even entitled to a refund of his contributions.

I was sure the government would do it, but nothing has been provided in such cases. They are very few indeed, but as we often say, there is no solution in that respect. There is still of course the problem of the differential between judges appointed before February 1, 1975 and judges appointed from that date on. This amounts to $4,200, and with the new increases the differential will be still greater. A solution will have to be found. What will it be? I do not know. However, I am afraid that it will be quite difficult to find one, because as was suggested, contributions cannot be levied from those appointed before 1975. However, in many cases, the latter have earned their pension, if not by right at least in fact under a gentlemen's agreement which provided that any person appointed to the bench who retired at age 65 after serving for 15 years was entitled to a full pension without any contribution. It is not at all easy to require such payments from those people who have been there twenty years and who actually have earned their pension.

Senator Frith: And who accepted an appointment on this condition.

Senator Flynn:this is the problem. One judge sued the government because he was appointed after February 1, 1975, but before the act providing for the contribution was passed and enacted. In his suit against the government, he submitted that the government could not do that. He requested a refund of his contributions and denied the government the right to hold back 6 per cent for his pension.

I believe that this case has not yet been heard in the Federal Court, but it is impossible to say what will happen.

In any event, this is only a related problem which does not concern the main purpose of the bill. One thing of which you can be sure is that the judges have been under the impression in the last few years, as Senator Frith has mentioned, that both Parliament and the government have been neglecting them. Since there has not been any readjustment in over four years, especially in these inflationary times, the morale of the judiciary has not been very good.

If, in order to immediately settle at least the problem of salaries and partially the problem of pensions, we have to pass the bill in its present form, even though the provisions which I mentioned earlier have been withdrawn, I am very willing to do so. However, as Senator Frith has stated, I believe that it would be a good thing for the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to examine the bill and ask the Minister of Justice questions as to the possibility of solving the remaining problems. In such a case, the bill could be referred to us tomorrow, and I for one would not object to its receiving royal assent immediately afterwards. I think that the judges have been very patient, and we should at least show them that we are concerned about their situation and that we want the Canadian judiciary to maintain the excellent reputation it has acquired.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

I suppose that I can now ask that it be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading tomorrow, but perhaps we should wait for the report of the committee.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): If you did that you would pre-empt the report of the committee, and I do not think Senator Goldenberg would like that.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, if I may be permitted to do so, I would like to advise those members of the committee who are here that the committee is meeting tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock, in room 356-S. There was another bill that we were going to consider, but we will consider this bill first, and the other will follow. Notices will be sent to members within a short time.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Would the chairman of the committee tell us who the witnesses are he wants to call before the committee when dealing with the bill to amend the Judges Act?

Senator Goldenberg: I could not answer that. Our advisor, Mr. du Plessis, is making the arrangements. He will advise me in a few minutes. I shall call him.

Senator Asselin: Will the Minister of Justice be there?

Senator Goldenberg: No, I do not think so. However, there will probably be an expert, Mr. Samuels.

Senator Flynn: He is one of the commissioners.

Senator Goldenberg: Yes, I think he will be the witness.

Senator Frith: And Mr. Low, an expert from the department.

Senator Goldenberg: I am told that it is Mr. Low. Do you know him, Senator Flynn?

Senator Flynn: Yes, it is Martin Low.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, I did not intend to go beyond a token word in this debate, having had an opportunity to work with all sides of Parliament in the hearings on the Constitution of Canada, but in view of the circumstances I feel that I should do so.

The committee sessions were gruelling, but we were very privileged, since we met so many truly national organizations of Canada which made tremendous contributions towards shaping the Constitution that they and their children will want to enjoy.

When, however, I hear those with a different perspective claim that this hammered-out package is the result of the machinations of one man, or that it is as divisive as the flag debate, or is damaging to French-speaking Canadians, I feel duty-bound to review events as I understand them, but without the help of quotations from ivory-tower mentors, including constitutional lawyers.

Generally, we are divided constitutionally because we have never faced the reality of our degree of statehood. The new package will determine this once and for all, and the "one man" responsible for this is the one elected to lead a government for all Canadians. It is ironic that senators from Quebec consider it too compromising a package for French-speaking Canadians of Quebec, and incredible when you think that for the first time since 1760 a constitutional document for all Canada will have an official French version.

How much more could have been attained had the Government of Quebec yielded to the concept of Canada as the people did, in electing Pierre Trudeau and 73 Liberal members from that province.

In 1864 Macdonald and Cartier were attorneys-general for Upper and Lower Canada, with Viscount Monck as the driving force. In the 1978-79 debate we had the Honourable Jean Chrétien with 10 attorneys-general, including Ray Romanow as co-chairman for the provinces. Things were looking good until the shopping list became too big for the store. This would have been enough to make anyone say, "I tried my best and gave my everything," but he did not, and may our country and its historians forever inscribe Jean Chrétien as one of the greatest great-grandsons of Confederation. His inspiration and empathy during the hearings will remain as one of my most epic memories.

The hearings were conducted with impressive skill, tact and impartiality on the part of the joint chairmen, Serge Joyal and Senator Hays. A vote of thanks from the Senate is owed to these two men.

Jake Epp, representing the Progressive Conservatives, comes in for the highest commendation. Unlike others, he supports patriation with an amending formula and an entrenched charter.

Viewpoints differed, but revealed nothing insurmountable except, of course, the usual caveat that all was generally in order, just so long as the premiers agreed. My ensuing probe into political history will indicate this impossibility.

There was one disappointing, if not bewildering, development during this experience, emanating from the man who is quoted in Hansard as saying:

> Mr. Chairman, this is a major first step in the new chapter of what, I hope, is a very exciting book in the new Canada of the twentieth and twenty-first centuries.

[Senator Wood.]

A few weeks later, when Premier Blakeney reversed his position, Lorne Nystrom, the man who made that statement and who had worked so diligently with us, felt compelled to reverse his position.

Honourable senators, we could quote many sources and many personalities who throughout our history have fought for home rule and national sovereignty. It would be painful for me to review all the events involved, and even disconcerting for anyone to listen to me do so.

Let us simply recall that the first all-Canada efforts in this direction arose in the 1830s, and after some years of systematic obstruction, hangings and exilings by the colonial government, the two Canadas were granted the Act of Union of 1848 setting up legislatures and certain autonomies. You will recall that when this act was proclaimed by Lord Elgin, he was virtually pilloried by the ruling "Family Compact" because he sided with the "Reformists," unlike Governor Head who was chastised by the home government for siding with the Tories.

When, some 20 years later, the imperial government decided, for reasons of better management, security and trade, to re-organize their colonies in British North America, some 30 parliamentarians met in Quebec in 1864 and in several weeks agreed on 72 articles which were to be promulgated by the imperial government. Governor General Lord Monck, because of his untiring efforts, patience, Irish empathy and experience as a Liberal member of Parliament at Westminster, was the man most responsible for the compromise solutions of the British North America Act, prompting and motivating discussions of it in Canada and parlaying it through the corridors of the Parliament at Westminster, which agreed that national defence on our 3,000 mile border had to be paid for and organized by the colony itself. There was no Prime Minister during that period of the colony, but we have one today, a home-grown Canadian who was born in Quebec, and whether or not he is your choice as Prime Minister, he has the constitutional right to govern on behalf of all Canadians. That is a fundamental difference in the two debates.

These new regulations would then apply to Canada as well as to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. History related most dramatically Nova Scotia's reaction to assuming a privileged position which dealt directly with the home office, as opposed to one which required a submission to a larger branch office. Newfoundland attended the conference as an observer and agreed to join Confederation 85 years later—that is, once they saw it starting to work for the maritimes.

In the meantime, national defence was a responsibility of the imperial government. Places like Prince Edward Island, the other island colony, had no recourse but to turn to the Canadian treasury to enable them to link up with the emerging transportation network and to provide the means to repurchase its land from the absentee landlords who had acquired it via Westminster patronage. Farmers would now have freehold tenure. This reminds me of the statement made at the last conference, a reference to their first nine inches of soil as their natural resource.

Therefore, armed with the Colonial Act of 1865, the imperial government was able to annex other land areas as they saw fit. I suppose it was very often a sink-or-swim choice, but regardless, we cannot turn back the clock. Furthermore, I could not, in hindsight, wish for or imagine a better institution to oversee our affairs of state than the mother Parliament at Westminster. In 1868 Nova Scotia instituted separation proceedings, but Westminster said no.

As time rolled along trade routes diversified, corporate marketing no longer needed flags and wars were becoming very costly. As a result, the colonies became a liability. Hence, the Statute of Westminster was enacted and we were told to fly on our own wings. But we could not make a pact among ourselves. The present youth of our great country is different from that of the thirties. Need we remind ourselves of those days? What alternatives will they have if we do not succeed this time?

We failed in 1931 supposedly because we could not produce an amending formula which was appropriate to our sovereignty then, any more than we can now, some 50 years later. No one in this chamber can spend the next 50 years on this project; and, if they could, the people of Canada would not. They want it done now, so let us do it now.

I do not agree with Senator Cook, who claims that we have been independent since 1931. We could have been, but the provinces were not ready to agree on the mandatory amending formula. But here I yield to constitutional experts, our crown lawyers. Can Senator Cook assure the Canadian people that, if we ask for simple patriation with no amending formula, certain provincial governments will not simply proclaim their autonomy in the interim? After all, it could be argued that they are in a quasi-legal position to attempt to do so. But then, I have never read law.

May I read you section 7(1) of the Statute of Westminster, 1931:

> Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to apply to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930, or any order, rule or regulation made thereunder.

It seemed innocent enough when we changed from a dominion government to a federal government. Most Canadians associated this with a United States type of federal government, but some conveniently saw it as an opportunity to bring Canada down to size and preferred to use the definition of a federation of states. We are not the government of a federation; rather, we are a federal government. This is not a lesson in history; it is more one in emotion and basic understanding of nationhood and security.

Respect for our degree of sovereignty with regard to both domestic and international matters has now reached a point where the world will soon be questioning our passports, our currency, our 200-mile limit, our international trade pacts and so forth.

The country to the south of us certainly must have more than a passing interest in our affairs. We know that Washington has had a Quebec desk for some time. I would imagine that they have now added a few more, pending the degree of sovereignty desired by the provincial petitioners to Westminster.

The fact that the Manitoba Court of Appeal has found the federal government in order has not dissuaded the premiers from dealing with the Colonial Office, nor has it altered the thinking of those in this House opposing the legislation on their behalf. The notion of provincial lobbyists or anyone petitioning the Colonial Office or Foreign Office of another country because they assume Westminster could obstruct is somewhat repugnant to me, as I think it is to most Canadians. Let us formally dissociate ourselves from any more of this undermining of our integrity as a people.

Unilateral action is a major hurdle in the minds of many people. It is an expression which both haunts us and rekindles our complexes as unassured Canadians. My view is that joint action with the provinces, though desirable, is just as impossible now as it was in 1867, when the British North America Act was imposed on us. Everyone was supposedly robbed then—everyone, that is, except the people who within that framework built us a nation before we could constitutionally become one. I also hold the view that we have progressed too far and have committed ourselves to too much to remain a non-nation of differing, checkerboard statehoods.

If, as suggested, we heed the advice of those who advocate trying "one more time" to achieve a joint approach, which one of the common front of premiers would compromise provincial benefits for those of value to the nation as a whole? I would not even venture a guess. As a matter of fact, in such a trade-off, we might find Ontario saying, "Enough. We will now deal directly with Westminster."

I think if you were to list all the demands and conditions of the premiers and study them, it would be obvious that, even if Westminster could grant them, we would have nothing more than a secretariat in lieu of a national government. But it seems fashionable to blame the federal government which must and does say "No." And is this national government, elected by the entire constituency of Canada, supposed to remain muzzled, lest it be considered divisive for refusing to allow one premier an exclusivity on something which belongs to all and serves to unite all Canada?

The fact that the provinces are daily undermining federal institutions is not considered by some to be divisive. The fact that one or two or perhaps three provinces want out—not for reasons of discontent but, rather, for supposed economic short-term advantages or cultural supremacy—again is not considered divisive; rather the national government, which withstands their barrages and which cannot give to one something which belongs to all, is called the divisive one.

Provincial governments have difficulties with competing interests among themselves. Most premiers will assume no responsibility in seeking a consensus for Canada at any cost to their own governments. Since their electorate is strictly provincial, their strategy, as shortsighted as it may seem, can also appear to be astute, and therein lies the difficulty.

Are federal members of Parliament and senators simply an extension of the provincial members or do they represent the constituents directly? Surely the whole has to be more responsible than any one part and at the same time equal to all the parts combined. Are we, as members of the Senate, not compelled to look at matters from and within the pan-Canada concept?

Premiers whose interests and degrees of political stability vary cannot be expected to agree with anyone about anything, not even among themselves. The common front of premiers, so-called, has but one goal—to prevent the supposed encroachment of national government. Rather, they want a mishmash, checkerboard series of sovereignty associates, with some premiers being more Canadian than others.

Has anyone asked where the funds for equalization payments would come from? And yet, at present, that is an essential basis of Confederation. Have the "have" provinces made private deals with the "have-nots"? Is it the same approach as Quebec suggested for languages of education—reciprocal arrangements within a much looser federation, with perhaps a common currency, and certainly a fragmented 200-mile limit? Do we honestly expect Canada to maintain sovereignty in the Arctic, when it would not be able to proclaim jurisdiction over five or six federated states on its eastern shores? Honourable senators, before suggesting "one more time", please consider the costs in terms of anguish and national credibility. Let us for a moment look at the record of federal-provincial conferences and see if we can find a way out.

The first meeting convened to study the question of Canada's power to amend its own Constitution and that of ownership of natural resources was in 1927. The Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King and the Honourable Ernest Lapointe argued for that power on the basis that self-respect as a nation demanded that the dominion Parliament should have that right to self-determination. Premier Taschereau objected on the ground that, if that power were formally granted, it might lead to the endangerment of provincial jurisdiction and rights. Premier Ferguson of Ontario maintained that such a power would jeopardize the Dominion's links with the United Kingdom.

So much for the great dividers of 1927! Certainly, no aspersions can be cast on the Tories on that one!

The four western premiers reported that there was strong support in their provinces for Senate reform, but they could not agree upon the nature of such reforms. It seems that "44" has been around a long time! But then that's normal: the premiers never understood us; they still don't.

● (1620)

The 1931 conference was convened by the Right Honourable R. B. Bennett. The purpose was to give the provinces an opportunity to express their views with regard to the imperial Statute of Westminster. There was no objection in principle made to the proposed legislation, and a proposal that the provisions of the statute relating to the repeal of the Colonial Laws Validity Act should extend to the provinces was approved.

However, it was subsequently desired by some provinces that the question of powers and procedures in respect of constitutional amendments should be discussed. This was found to be impossible at the meeting, but it was agreed that a constitutional conference should be summoned as soon as possible.

Here we go again. The tragedy here was that since Canada found no amending formula, as had the other dominions, it might be argued that the Colonial Laws Validity Act was still very much in force.

Prime Minister Bennett convened another conference in 1933, and apparently the domestic state of affairs had the provinces asking the federal government to continue its assistance to the provinces in the discharge of their constitutional obligations so that they might effectively deal "with the present unprecedented economic conditions by distribution of direct relief." The minutes go on to say that the relative legislation jurisdiction of the dominion and the provinces respecting old age pensions, unemployment and social insurance were discussed without any resolution being adopted.

The next conference, which took place in 1934, was uneventful. It dealt with a petition by Quebec for permission to conduct lotteries.

The Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King convened the 1935 conference to study all aspects of federal-provincial relations, including a revision of the British North America Act. The subconference passed a resolution stating: first, that amendments to the British North America Act are necessary and imperative; and, second, that Canada should have the power to amend its own Constitution. New Brunswick cast a negative vote because it could not agree to all the terms.

In 1941 the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King again convened a conference to obtain the views of the nine provinces on the 1940 Rowell-Sirois Report on Dominion-Provincial Relations. However, when the agenda committee made its report, Alberta, Ontario and British Columbia were opposed in principle. The conference adjourned without even a discussion of the constitutional issue.

Then in 1950 the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent's conference brought unanimous agreement that Canada should have the power to amend its Constitution itself. There were eight points of agreement and it was suggested that a standing committee be set up. Those recommendations were adopted.

There was a second session of the 1950 conference, which reported that it was not possible to secure unanimous agreement but that there would be a continuing committee of attorneys general which would report in December 1950. At the end of 1950 it was decided to suspend that committee pending consideration of tax agreements and related matters.

There were four further meetings of attorneys general in 1960-61. The initiative for that came from Premier Lesage. It was during those meetings that the Honourable Davey Fulton submitted his proposals to domicile the British North America Act in Canada with a permanent method of amendment. All provinces except Quebec were opposed to that. It was recorded there that the British North America Act could be frozen indefinitely, if the amending formula were not achieved before patriation.

In the September conference of that 1961 series, the Honourable Davey Fulton hinted that the federal government might seek patriation of the British North America Act, even if unanimous consent could not be achieved. That must have been most disconcerting for the Diefenbaker government.

In August 1964 the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson presided over a conference held in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island. Quebec issued a separate communiqué stating its reservations with respect to the 1961 formula. Premier Robichaud of New Brunswick suggested that there should be a union of maritime provinces, but Premier Shaw of Prince Edward Island disagreed with that.

The conference reconvened in Ottawa in October, again with the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson presiding. The major achievement of that session was that the premiers approved unanimously a unanimous report issued by the attorneys general. Once again, the conference ended with the issuance of a communiqué stating that the various governments would continue to study the workings of the Canadian Constitution.

The next constitutional conference took place in 1968 and dealt with the desirability of entrenching a Charter of Rights in the Constitution. The Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, then the Minister of Justice, argued that the division of jurisdiction between the federal government and the provinces with respect to the rights of Canadians under the present system required the entrenchment of a Charter of Rights, if those rights were to be fully protected. He argued that such an entrenched charter would not amount to a transfer of power from one level of government to another but would, instead, be a restriction of both levels of government in favour of the rights of Canadians. Provisions affecting those rights would not be subject to amendment by a government through a simple act of a legislature; rather, amendment of such provisions would require the federal Parliament and a given number of legislatures, the number to be determined by an amending formula, to agree to any changes.

Honourable senators, does that appear to you as such a divisive statement? It is somewhat painful history in retrospect, but some of you were there.

Once again, the conference ended with a proposal to establish a continuing committee of officials.

At the second meeting of that conference discussion rather centred on taxation and regional disparities. Premier Weir of Manitoba said that a discussion of these matters should take precedence over concerns for language and the entrenchment of fundamental rights. It was at that meeting that Attorney General Donahoe of Nova Scotia argued that the new Constitution should include the principle of equalization and should set out its formula. A committee was formed to study problems of regional disparities, official languages and the Charter of Rights.

Alberta stated that the concept of two languages was "objectionable and unacceptable"—a still familiar cry from the west federation.

"Quebec like any state must have increased powers," said Premier Bertrand, in order to "proportionally shoulder its responsibility." The same meeting heard the maritime provinces appeal jointly for a strong central government. It would seem, honourable senators, that we are always returning to square one.

The June 1969 conference dealt with taxing, spending, and regional disparities in the constitutional context. It was agreed then to meet again at the year's end. Well, December 1969 found Premier Bertrand disagreeing with Prime Minister Trudeau's proposals. Premiers Robarts and Bennett supported the objection in part, while Premier Bennett reiterated his proposals for a five-region Canada. Premier Smith of Nova Scotia argued that equalization powers should be the exclusive right of the federal Parliament, while the premiers of British Columbia and Alberta contended that a system of guaranteed annual incomes would be far more effective.

In retrospect, honourable senators, it seems that the more we probe, the more we find division and vacillation among the provinces.

At the conference of 1970 Premier Robarts stressed that the immediate and high priority should be to examine and agree upon an amending formula. Consequently, two additional meetings were agreed to.

At the conference of February 1971 the federal and provincial governments agreed to proceed as quickly as possible to patriate the Constitution with an appropriate amending formula. They also agreed to entrench fundamental political rights and language legislation, providing it had a sufficient-number clause. Matters concerning regional disparities and the Supreme Court were also settled. However, Premier Thatcher disagreed with Quebec in respect of the privacy of financing and administration in certain areas, and Prime Minister Trudeau noted that, if a province were to go too far in its own special way, it would not be able to have the equalization grants which are paid by the federal government to the poorer provinces.

Almost, but not quite, honourable senators; but we are getting closer.

In June 1971 the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau called a conference at Victoria at the suggestion of Premier Bennett. The charter which had resulted from the consensus of the previous conference was presented for acceptance by the provinces. Just about everything imaginable was included. Reservations were expressed, but by the deadline of June 28 eight provincial governments had accepted, while Quebec refused to recommend the charter to its national assembly.

So close and now so far. Does anyone still think unanimity should be the criterion instead of unilateral action?

The conference that ensued in 1978—which Quebec attended only as an observer pending the referendum—did not seem unduly alarming, because by that time several provinces had studied and copied Quebec's bargaining techniques. But, in the end, those techniques have achieved nothing, either for Quebec or for them, or for Canada.

At that same conference Quebec and the four western provinces were opposed to the entrenchment of a Charter of Rights. Premiers Lévesque, Lougheed and Bennett were opposed to the official languages aspect, but the real thrust was towards having provincial sovereignty ranging from increasing powers in certain areas to having the entire power in certain areas.

In the conference of February 1979 Premier Davis argued that the federal government had the power to seek patriation unilaterally and should do so immediately. Premiers Lévesque and Blakeney, however, argued that firm agreements on constitutional change should be achieved before Ottawa sought patriation. It was at that time that Prime Minister Trudeau said he would meet one more time with the premiers before seeking patriation unilaterally.

● (1630)

The ensuing conference of June 1980 started in turmoil when Premier Lévesque opposed in principle the first five words of the statement, which read "We, the people of Canada" and referred to it as centralist thinking, ignoring the duality of Canada and Quebec's right to self-determination. Other premiers also rejected the statement on principle.

Honourable senators, I suppose the most crucial problem facing some legislators in Canada is, what will they do for an encore after the Canadian people have won their Constitution?

At present the rights and freedoms of Canadians are not constitutionally guaranteed, and it has become increasingly evident that more protection than the ordinary process of parliamentary democracy is required.

The amending process which we are bringing forward is a just one for all. It reflects the federal and the regional nature of Canada. For the first time it formally involves the provinces in the amending procedure, a procedure which is designed to ensure that there is substantial support for amendment to the Constitution in each of the four regions of Canada. It provides an opportunity for the provincial governments to present an alternative formula for the approval of the people of Canada, if the provincial governments can agree on one to be presented.

Legislative majorities should not have complete freedom to act inadvertently or deliberately against the rights of minorities. We must not forget such incidents as the Padlock Law of 1937, the asbestos strike and how it affected civil liberties, Bill 22, Bill 101, or the occurrences involving Japanese Canadians, the Manitoba schools legislation, Witnesses of Jehovah, and Italian Canadians in the second world war.

Here, I must interject a rebuke to Senator Thompson when he referred to his working in the Italian district of his riding and dressing as shabbily as he could. It takes more than shabby clothes to simulate a minority—yes, even an Italian one. I should know, because this includes me and my own parents. Can we not find better ways of identifying ourselves, for in effect we are all ethnic, even those of us from France and the United Kingdom? Rather, Senator Thompson should direct his efforts at least to the mobility clauses in the charter and use his experience to help improve them, rather than join those who would not want migrant construction workers to have every opportunity of earning a living. Let us re-instill some of that vigor that Viscount Monck, our Liberal, Irish, Governor General, gave us in the 1860s.

Travel naturally relates to mobility rights, which are guaranteed in the charter. The Newfoundlander who found a career in British Columbia will now have that right to work guaranteed. Some provinces do not like this. While it may be good for the pursuits of the individual, it may upset their power in certain jurisdictions. In other words, they put their own interests over human rights.

My personal esteem for Senator Thompson will, I hope, allow me to relate some plights of minorities in Montreal, where I have lived as one for the past 2,922 weeks. In Montreal, during the dirty thirties, neither the Irish nor the Italians went to work in tuxedos, rented or otherwise. The Italians could not gain access to French-speaking institutions, because they were "des immigrés"; nor could they gain admission to Protestant schools, because they were Papists. The Irish, on the other hand, had access to Catholic schooling, but in the French language only. The solution was interesting. When the Irish demanded Catholic schooling in English and were squelched under threat of excommunication, some of the more affluent in the community directly petitioned the Pope, whereupon they won their case. Here is an example of a home-grown Canadian problem solved in Italy. Minorities of Roman Catholic faith were now able to enter a subsection of the school system. This grew to such a point where it had to be stopped, because decreasing enrolment was causing empty classes in the schools of the majority.

The street riots of St. Leonard were the precursor of Bill 22, which was instituted to cancel Bill 63, which had allowed the parents to choose among the options available. When anyone's right of choice is removed, the removers will eventually find themselves in very deep trouble, but, in the meantime, it would be better and human not to remove acquired rights. The federal charter will make this type of legislation much more difficult to enact. Canadians should have their choice, be it schooling, religion, or domicile.

It has been said that a referendum is foreign to our system. That is not really the case. There was an epic one conducted in 1980, the results of which are manifested in our package. Referenda, I say, are here to stay, thanks to a province. The charter will also levy controls on public servants as they interpret and enforce regulations, and this in itself will humanize the process of government.

The official opposition in the Commons opposes the charter in general, just as they traditionally oppose a budget speech—as though the people take them seriously. However, no one has yet opposed any one aspect of the charter. Rather, the whole resolution seems wrong—that is, if it is enacted with patriation; although that, too, is acceptable if it is enacted at a later date.

Honourable senators, experience over recent years should prove that provincial legislators generally are not interested in the larger constituency of Canada. They will agree with all the individual rights imaginable, but at a price, and that price is the essence of national government and our institutions needed to enforce the maintenance of these rights, let alone our impact abroad.

Courts have traditionally settled disputes between citizens and the state, and in the future they would have the charter to guide them. We all remember Roncarelli vs. Duplessis and the role of the Supreme Court.

The charter will guarantee mobility. Some premiers oppose this provision. I hope that no member of the Senate, regardless of provincial party affiliation, will support that opposition. The charter will protect citizens from discrimination on the basis of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex, physical or mental disability. The federal and provincial governments will be given a two-year reprieve on this one, and, Heaven knows, we may need it. Aboriginal rights are to be recognized and affirmed.

Which of these new-found and guaranteed freedoms can honourable senators honestly oppose? Even if the adjustment is too much for some premiers, would honourable senators oppose these freedoms with equal zeal if Liberal premiers were obstructing?

Part I of the Constitution Act, 1981 was changed in committee. To cite an example, clause 1 of Part I was altered after representations and suggestions by the following organizations: the Canadian Jewish Congress; the Canadian Civil Liberties Association; Société franco-manitobaine; the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association; the Canadian Federation of Civil Liberties and Human Rights Associations; the Canadian Human Rights Commission; the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women; the National Association of Japanese Canadians; the Ukrainian Canadian Committee; the National Association of Women and the Law; the Council of National Ethnocultural Organizations of Canada; and the Coalition for the Protection of Human Life—I could go on. I believe there are another ten organizations.

Clause 2 was amended in response to testimony from the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Council on Social Development, and so on.

Have the opposing senators who are members of the Canadian Bar expressed their indignation to these groups for their alleged support of Canadian nationhood? Are the honourable senators who are members of the Bar aware that their profession's spokespersons have also prepared and submitted a list of principles which could be used to describe the character, the institutions and the purpose of Canadians? To quote in part, they say, "The Canadian Constitution should sell the essential attributes of Canadian federalism." Then, they go on to mention eight essential attributes.

All told, some 97 groups of witnesses advised the Joint Committee on the Constitution. Their testimony overwhelmingly supported the principle of patriation initiatives that include a Charter of Rights. Also, some 1,280 written submissions were received. The committee held 106 meetings over a four-month period and debated the resolution for 267 hours. Then some 67 amendments were made to the original draft, many of which profoundly strengthened the position and dignity of the Canadian people, and affirm our attitude of giving when we can, but never taking any rights away from anyone. This hardly seems like unilateral action, especially when compared to actual representation by Canadians in the Statute of Westminster or the British North America Act.

These aforementioned groups, who by and large represent national memberships, made the decision to petition their Canadian Parliament, rather than lobby Westminster, as it would have been beneath their dignity. That should tell us something. Is it wrong for this house to support these people in their desire for meaningful nationhood? Is it wrong for us to release them from the restraints of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, which technically is still within the framework of our statutes? Why is there such obstruction, which is generally along party lines? Which item or aspect is offensive, and, if we, the senators of Canada, had to face an electorate rather than broad public opinion—which I will not dwell upon—which section of the charter would we eliminate on behalf of the people of Canada? Would we say that human rights and dignity are a provincial affair? Surely at some time or another, either at home or internationally, something other than the Canadian Mint has to be a national responsibility.

● (1640)

Honourable senators, would we deny our constituents—who, in our case, are the people in all of Canada—the most up-to-date Charter of Rights in the world, one which no provincial legislature can change on an ad hoc basis?

Federal governments will come and go, as will provincial legislatures, actually in a ratio of 10 to 1, but our Parliament and our first Canadian-born charter, our really home-grown assertion of and momentum to nationhood, must be enshrined—and this with the distinguished blessing of this chamber.

Honourable senators, have you ever considered that this package could conceivably usher in a better Canada, in so many respects? Some may have reservations, and I respect that fact, but what is the alternative? Let us assume our responsibility—which is for the common good and welfare of all regions and all the peoples of Canada.

Separatism started in 1868, with only the federal government as a bulwark. Let us not unduly weaken the fabric by shouldering the provinces who often turn one against the other. The resulting scenarios are too horrible to imagine.

The Quebec government should be protesting the demands of Newfoundland, Alberta and Saskatchewan; but it is not, and it will not because, with a separatist mentality, it knows it will have to negotiate oil and offshore rights directly with those emerging states. Why, in the meantime, should it bother with Canada?

Can you imagine the bargaining position of Prince Edward Island in this triangle, yet it supports the common front? It is, indeed, incredible. The common-front provinces welcome Prince Edward Island as a number only—pawns in a game the Islanders cannot possibly win. Do they not realize that their equalization payments can only be derived from resource revenue-sharing? Yet they support the provinces which would deprive them of this. Ontario cannot be asked to do it alone.

Can Senators Cook, Thompson and Deschatelets devise some other ways to secure meaningful nationhood, to prevent the erosion of rights; to stand on guard against future pressures from within and without; and to dissuade premiers from organizing lobbies in London and perhaps other capitals—as other capitals have lobbyists in some of our provincial capitals? This does not exactly instill faith in one's own institutions.

Can we not guarantee Canadians at least the security of remaining Canadian, in spite of some provincial threats to the contrary? Lawyers know full well, when entering a debate on behalf of a client, that one of the clients is going to be the loser. Honourable senators, the client in this debate is all of us and the people we represent. Either we all win or we all lose. Please treat this package with a different routine from the superficial criticisms of a budget debate.

I too, like Senator Deschatelets, would want to represent Quebecers, but all Quebecers, including those who welcomed the Norwegians in the first century, as well as those from many lands who followed in succeeding decades. Governments must speak the official language of the people and not vice versa. We want rights that can be legally protected for all Canadians and not be subject to the whim of acceptance by provincial governments, nor, for that matter, the whim of a federal government. You may argue that protection by Parliament has been safe enough protection for individual rights in Canada. We can use Bill 101 as an example of collective rights of a majority over those of a minority.

The Canadians of Quebec, just a year ago, outvoted the would-be anti-Canadians and are thereby assured a place in the Constitution Act, 1981. They are and want to remain Canadian. We promised them a framework whereby it would be possible for them to travel and live first-class anywhere in Canada. Is it any wonder the separatist Government of Quebec is petitioning Westminster on its own, with disregard for those Canadians who said "No" to them on May 20, 1980? Do you realize how our package foils their game plan? Surely, honourable senators, you will not support the aims of the Péquiste government, but rather those of the majority of Quebecers who are counting on us.

On the eve of the referendum, our Prime Minister said:

> I know that I can solemnly promise that should the "No" side win, we will set in motion forthwith, the mechanism required for renewing the Constitution and that we will not stop until we have achieved this goal.

The Prime Minister was relying on the goodwill which many of the premiers expressed during the referendum campaign to carry out the necessary reform through federal-provincial conferences.

Last September I attended the federal-provincial conference, and, instead of seeing people involved in negotiations to achieve the goal of a renewed Constitution, I saw our first ministers discuss power-sharing issues above all else. They were not too anxious or concerned about the patriation of our Constitution, and were certainly not too concerned about a charter.

Finally, on the other hand, you have this young Inuit member of Parliament, Peter Ittinuar, who, at the hearing on January 30, said:

> However, there is one person I would like to mention that I think perhaps whose patience has been tried, but that is the Prime Minister of Canada, without whose approval we would not be doing this today. I personally, and on behalf of the aboriginal peoples, would like to thank him and together we will build a great nation.

We will build a great nation!

Honourable senators, let us make this our commitment also.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, in the first sentence of his dissenting judgment in the reference by the Manitoba government on this resolution, Mr. Justice O'Sullivan, of the Court of Appeal of Manitoba, said:

> In this constitutional case, the submission of the Attorney-General of Canada ends up in the proposition that a political party, if it forms the majority of both houses of the Canadian Parliament, has the power to amend the constitution of our country as it pleases.

In my opinion, this accurately, if somewhat disturbingly, summarizes the position of the federal government with respect to this resolution before the Parliament of Canada. I am sure that most Canadians who do not profess to having any expertise in constitutional law would think that, on the face of it, that submission is absurd. This submission is, of course, one of the principal issues I will be discussing later in my speech.

When the Liberal Whip, Senator Petten, wants to find out how you intend to vote on any particular matter, his approach is to ask his Liberal colleague whether he is having any problem with the matter. When this question was put to me with respect to this resolution, my answer was that I certainly had, and may I say that I still have.

It was not long after this resolution was presented that I was approached by one of my fellow Liberal senators, for whom I have great regard, who asked me to say that I would vote against the resolution unless clause 44 were amended so that the Senate would retain its right of absolute veto with respect to any proposed constitutional amendment that would change or abolish the Senate. May I remind honourable senators that clause 44 gave the Senate a right of suspensive veto for 90 days only in connection with those amendments to the Constitution requiring the amending formula provided for in clauses 41 and 42 of the original resolution. This meant, in effect, that the Senate could be fundamentally changed or abolished without the Senate's consent.

Honourable senators, I was a member of, and very active on, the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution, which was appointed on June 28, 1978 to consider proposed constitutional changes, including reform of the Senate. That committee never did make a formal report with respect to Senate reform, although it did come to some tentative conclusions which it informally made known to the government late in December 1978, so that they could be considered before a federal-provincial meeting of ministers held in January 1979.

To say that the committee lacked a sense of urgency on the subject of Senate reform is to put it mildly. It was not even reconstituted after the federal election of May 1979. Since being appointed to the Senate in 1973, I would describe the Senate's record with respect to reform of itself as one of creative inertia—lots of talk from individual senators, accompanied in some cases by a certain amount of bluster, but no action except when the continuance of its existence in its present form is threatened from time to time.

Such a threat was again perceived in the federal-provincial talks on constitutional reform being held in the summer of 1980, so on July 8, 1980 the question of constitutional reform was again referred to a committee, this time the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, which committee appointed a subcommittee to consider the matter. Ten additional senators were appointed to that committee for the express purpose of serving on the subcommittee which consisted of 15 senators. I was one of those senators, and I, again, was very active, particularly on a subcommittee of the subcommittee which considered the whole question of Senate reform and was responsible for most of what appeared in Part II of the report which was euphemistically titled, "Toward a Renewed Senate."

● (1650)

At this point I would like to interject that while there has been no reform of the Senate since I have been here, I am of the opinion that the quality of the work of the Senate has been improved because the quality of the members of this house has improved. The opposition has been enormously strengthened by the very high calibre of the appointments to it by both Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Clark, and that, taken with the generally high calibre of the appointments to this side of the house, has resulted in a noticeably higher percentage of senators who are doing an outstanding or reasonably competent job.

The subcommittee settled on the main thrust of its report in August 1980, and its recommendations were approved in principle by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on September 3, 1980, which was before the Meeting of First Ministers. These recommendations were then unofficially communicated to, at least, the federal government so that they would be known before that meeting.

In order to remind honourable senators of what the recommendation of that Senate committee was on the subject of the present absolute veto power of the Senate, I am going to read that part of the committee report dealing with the subject:

> At present the Senate has the legal power and right to reject any bill whatever, and as often as it sees fit. As already noted, it has not exercised that power for many years. Its members have been fully conscious of the fact that any such action would provoke a storm of protest against "frustration of the people's will" as expressed by the elected House of Commons.
>
> It is conceivable that if the Senate were faced with legislation that in its view would seriously undermine national unity, or that had aroused strong opposition in one or more of the regions (especially if the bill were brought forward toward the end of a Parliament, and embodied a policy that had never been before the people at a general election) it might decline to pass it until it had been endorsed in a general election. (The Senate did this with the Naval Aid Bill of 1913.)
>
> We do not believe that in a democratic society an appointed second chamber should have these powers. It is important, however, to make sure that any highly controversial bill passed by the House of Commons really does represent the will of the people, or, at the very least, the considered judgment of the people's representatives. In such cases the House of Commons should at least be forced to think again.
> We feel that for this purpose the present absolute veto power is not necessary; indeed, the very fact of its absoluteness makes the Senate reluctant to reject any bill, however bad, even temporarily. We believe that a six months' suspensive veto would give the Senate all the power it needs. The government, the House of Commons and the country would be compelled to think again. The Senate would have enough time to put its case squarely before the public. If, when the six months were up, the government and the House of Commons were so convinced of public support for the bill that they insisted on re-passing it in the House of Commons, then the Senate would have done its duty and could acquiesce with a clear conscience. It would be essential, of course, that the bill be re-introduced in the House of Commons and re-passed there. A mere lapse of six months, after which the bill would come into effect without any reconsideration by the Commons, would destroy the whole purpose of the suspensive veto.

In making this recommendation, the committee was following the recommendation of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada, which was chaired by Senator Molgat and the Honourable Mark MacGuigan, M.P. After two years of intensive study, they recommended in 1972, "that the present veto power of the Senate be reduced to a suspensive veto for a period of six months." There was no suggestion in that report that an exception be made for constitutional amendments.

Might I point out that the Senate committee report was not finally adopted by the committee until a meeting held on October 30, 1980? At that meeting, without any prior notice to the committee as a whole that changes were going to be proposed, two recommendations for reforming the Senate were deleted from the draft approved in principle in September. Yet no suggestion was made to change that part of the report dealing with the powers of the Senate in light of the resolution on the Constitution which had been introduced weeks earlier.

It is true that the report only deals with legislative powers, and specifically refers to bills. However, the first draft of the report prepared by the distinguished consultant to the committee did provide for our consideration that the suspensive veto should only apply to ordinary legislation, "as distinct from constitutional amendments and perhaps other constitutional legislation." These words were deleted from the report by the subcommittee of the subcommittee, and I cannot recall anyone ever suggesting that they be re-inserted during the ensuing process of approval by the full subcommittee and the full committee. Surely, the reason given for substituting a six months' suspensive veto for the present absolute veto of the Senate with respect to bills would apply even more forcefully with respect to a proposed constitutional change which must be approved not only by an elected House of Commons but also by a majority of the provincial legislatures as provided for in an amending formula.

I have previously made my position clear to many of my fellow senators that as far as I am concerned, clause 44 was reasonable except that the 90-day suspensive veto provided for should be extended to six months, in line with the suspensive veto recommendation in the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and the Report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada of 1972.

For that reason, I emphatically disagree with the government dropping clause 44 under pressure from certain senators who claimed that enough Liberal senators would vote against the resolution to defeat it if that part dealing with abolishing the Senate's absolute veto with respect to a constitutional amendment changing or abolishing the Senate was not eliminated.

One of my other objections to the way the government is proceeding is that they want the Parliament of the United Kingdom to deal with the Joint Address before the Supreme Court of Canada decides whether or not it is legal to do so.

Let me make my opinion perfectly clear on this point. While I had not previously studied the question in depth, I could never understand how a constitutional convention could be turned into a legally binding law on the say-so of several law professors, of whom Professor W. R. Lederman is the leading exponent, when there is absolutely no decision of any competent court to support that proposition. Many eminent law professors and writers on constitutional law, including the great A. V. Dicey, have clearly distinguished between a constitutional law which the courts will enforce. To quote Dicey:

> The other set of rules consisting of conventions, understandings, habits, or practices which, though they may regulate the conduct of the several members of the sovereign power, of the Ministry, or of other officials, are not in reality laws at all since they are not enforced by the courts. This portion of constitutional law may, for the sake of distinction, be termed the "conventions of the constitution," or constitutional morality.

Mr. Justice Hall, of the Manitoba Court of Appeal, also quotes various other authorities to support this proposition. I will refer to only four of them.

Colin R. Munro, in his 1975 Law Quarterly Review article "Laws and Conventions Distinguished," states:

> The validity of conventions cannot be the subject of proceeding in court of law. Reparation for breach of such rules will not be affected by any legal sanction. There are no cases which contradict these propositions. In fact, the idea of a court enforcing a mere convention is so strange that the question hardly arises.

Peter Hogg, in his 1977 book Constitutional Law of Canada says:

> Conventions are rules of the constitution which are not enforced by the law courts. Because they are not enforced by law courts, they are best regarded as non-legal rules—

Senator Flynn: Peter Hogg also said that Parliament could abolish the Senate without the consent of the provinces.

Senator Godfrey: I am not aware of that.

In the Reference re Disallowance and Reservation of Provincial Legislation (1938) S.C.R. 71, Chief Justice Duff, of the Supreme Court of Canada, generally considered one of Canada's greatest judges, stated:

> We are not concerned with constitutional usage. We are concerned with questions of law which, we repeat, must be determined by reference to the enactments of the British North America Acts of 1867 to 1930, the Statute of Westminster, and, it might be, to relevant statutes of the Parliament of Canada if there were any.

Finally, in a decision of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland in 1948, before it joined Canada, Mr. Justice Winter said:

> To these conventions the adjective constitutional is applied; any action violating them is termed unconstitutional . . . Not merely has a court of law no power to redress directly a violation of a genuinely constitutional role, but it is, I should think, the last place in which redress should be sought.

I rather like Mr. Justice Hall's statement in his judgment that:

> "It is not appropriate to the exercise of the judicial function to find a political orange and turn it into a judicial apple"

And he concludes by saying that "the conventions of the Constitution are not for judges."

• (1700)

Chief Justice Freedman, in his judgment, came to the conclusion that there was no constitutional convention, so that he did not have to decide specifically whether a constitutional convention, if it existed, could become a rule of law. However, he does quote some of the same authorities referred to by Mr. Justice Hall, which I have already quoted.

Chief Justice Freedman does refer to the compact theory of Confederation and states:

> In my view the theory in question is supported neither by history nor by subsequent usage.

Honourable senators will recall that I began this speech by quoting the opening sentence of the judgment of Mr. Justice O'Sullivan with approval. He wrote the main dissenting judgment. He quoted extensively from the judgments in the Newfoundland case referred to in the judgment of Mr. Justice Hall, and quotes also from a judgment of the Privy Council to the same effect.

However, even in the face of all this, he has no difficulty in deciding that although:

> —the constitutional convention referred to has not been established as a matter simply of precedent, it is, however, a constitutional principle binding in law.

Evidently, because he thinks it should be.

As a lawyer, I found his reasons unconvincing and not supported by any relevant legal authority. Judges must decide what the existing law is. They should leave to the politicians, legal practitioners and law professors the job of saying what they think the law should be on a matter as politically controversial as this.

As to Mr. Justice Huband's dissenting judgment, I can only say that he does not even attempt to quote a single legal authority to support his views. As a lawyer, I found his reasoning irrelevant and unconvincing. If I were a political science student at a university I would have found his theory—and I cannot place it any higher than that—as to what constitutional practice should be, rather interesting, if novel.

As I said earlier, one of the matters that I very definitely disagree with is the apparent eagerness of the federal government to press the U.K. Parliament to deal with this resolution before the Supreme Court of Canada has a chance to adjudicate as to whether or not it is legal.

While I strongly agree with the government that it is legal, and I am of the opinion that the Supreme Court of Canada will so decide, I am sure that honourable senators will not be surprised when I confess that there has been the occasion—very rare, of course—when a court has decided a legal question contrary to an opinion that I gave when I was practising law.

Senator Flynn: I don't doubt.

Senator Godfrey: So there is always the possibility that they may do so this time.

In view of the action taken by six provinces challenging the legality of the process being followed, I am of the opinion that there is no urgency demonstrated that would justify the amendments being enacted by the U.K. Parliament until the legality of the process has been determined by our Supreme Court. Because of the split decision in the Manitoba Court of Appeal, there is bound to be speculation in the U.K. Parliament as to whether this process is legal, and that may well influence the vote of individual members.

It seems to me that it is common sense and tactically sound to get that question out of the way before the U.K. Parliament votes on the matter. If I were a member of the U.K. Parliament, I would certainly insist that consideration of the bill be postponed until after the decision of the Supreme Court, and I am of the opinion that the federal government should do everything it can to expedite the determination of the matter by the Supreme Court before the resolution is sent to the United Kingdom.

I would now like to discuss the report of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the British House of Commons, chaired by Sir Anthony Kershaw. I must say that my initial reaction to this committee, even considering what the Westminster Parliament should do with a joint address before it was actually received, was very adverse. My opinion did not change when I read the summaries in the press of their conclusions.

However, my ears pricked up a bit when I was told that Mr. Gordon Robertson, the former Clerk of the Privy Council and for some years the Prime Minister's principal adviser on federal-provincial relations, had read the report and thought it was both serious and scholarly.

I then obtained a copy of the document and read it carefully, and may I say that I completely agree with Mr. Robertson? It is well written, meticulously researched, and its conclusions, generally speaking, are very logical, even if one does not necessarily agree with all of them or that the U.K. Parliament should follow them. I must say that I was somewhat surprised to hear Senator Lamontagne refer to this report in his speech as "biased and inconsistent."

There is some very interesting and relevant constitutional history, not generally known, revealed in this report. In several instances it gave me a new slant on what had happened in the past, and I would like to refer briefly to some of them.

Honourable senators are now aware from other speeches that in 1907, in respect of a resolution of the Canadian Parliament for an amendment to the B.N.A. Act with respect to the payment of subsidies from the federal to the provincial governments, the Legislature of British Columbia had passed a resolution protesting against the settlement and also its being regarded as final and irrevocable, and laid a petition before His Majesty to that effect.

In introducing the B.N.A. Bill, 1907, the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. Winston Churchill, as he then was, stated:

> He did not pretend to go into the merits of the difference on a constitutional question before the British Columbia and the Federal Government. We on this side did not know enough to decide upon the merits of the claim. On > the other hand, he would be very sorry if it were thought that the action which His Majesty's Government had decided to take meant that they had decided to establish as a precedent that whenever there was a difference on a constitutional question before the Federal Government and one of the provinces, the Imperial Government would always be prepared to accept the Federal point of view as against the provincial. In deference to the representations of British Columbia the words "final and unalterable" applying to the revised scale had been omitted from the bill.

In light of this quotation, it really is extraordinary that Mr. Serge Joyal maintained, in his speech in the House of Commons, that London removed these words solely because, in the opinion of Mr. Churchill, they seemed totally inappropriate in the legislation. There was no mention by Mr. Joyal of the opposition of British Columbia which, according to Mr. Churchill, had considerable influence.

I find equally extraordinary the statement by Senator Lamontagne, in his speech, to the same effect, and his further statement that:

> British Columbia opposed the Canadian request on the ground that the proposed increase in subsidies was not high enough.

While that is true, as far as it goes, Senator Lamontagne carefully refrains from pointing out that Mr. Churchill said, in the speech quoted above, that the provincial legislature:

> —passed a resolution protesting against the settlement being regarded as final and irrevocable. They also laid before His Majesty a petition asking that, in any legislation to give effect to the Ottawa resolutions (of a Federal-Provincial Conference of 1906), the arrangement should not be taken as of a final and irrevocable character.

In commenting on this statement of Mr. Churchill, the Kershaw committee's report stated:

> Here we record it simply as evidence of a recognition that the federal character of Canada's constitution might affect the responsibility and the actions of the U.K. authorities in relation to that constitution.

Thus we do have an instance of the U.K. Parliament, at the request of a provincial legislature, altering an amendment to the B.N.A. Act proposed by the Canadian Parliament, although they may have also thought it only an improvement in drafting in accordance with general legislative practice.

Subsequently, in connection with this amendment, Lord Elgin, Secretary of State for the Colonies, wrote to the Premier of British Columbia that he:

> —fully appreciates the force of the opinion expressed that the British North America Act was the result of terms of union agreed upon by the contracting provinces and that its terms cannot be altered merely at the wish of the Dominion Government.

But that he feels, however:

> —that in view of the unanimity of the Dominion Parliament and of all the Provincial Governments save that of British Columbia, he would not in the interests of Canada be justified in any effort to override the decision of the Dominion Parliament.

Senator Lamontagne: Would the honourable senator go on with the quote?

Senator Godfrey: I do not have it. I believe I have included everything—

Senator Lamontagne: Except the substance.

Senator Flynn: You knew about that yourself.

Senator Godfrey: In 1943 the federal Parliament proposed an amendment for the postponement of redistribution of seats in the Canadian House of Commons until after the war.

When the bill was being considered in the British House of Commons, Clement Attlee, the British Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, stated:

> I have no information as to any province objecting, but, in any case, the matter is before us by an address voted by both Houses of Parliament and it is difficult for us to look behind the fact.

In fact, while the amendment involved no question of the powers or rights of the provincial legislatures or governments, there was opposition to the amendment by Premier Godbout, a Liberal Premier of the Province of Quebec and the Quebec legislature.

• (1710)

While it is somewhat lengthy, I believe I should read into the record that part of the Kershaw report dealing with this incident:

> The existence of opposition by a Provincial government and legislature was not conveyed to the UK Government until after the BNA Bill 1943 had received the Royal Assent. The Canadian request had not been conveyed to the UK Government until 17 July 1943; it was accompanied by a request that the legislative processes in Westminster be completed before 24 July. It was introduced and passed in the House of Lords on 21 July. On the morning of that day, the Dominions Office received from the UK High Commissioner in Canada a telegram stating:
>
> "Mr. St-Laurent, the Minister of Justice, told me the following informally today. Some citizens in Ottawa and elsewhere are preparing representations which they wish to make against the passage through Parliament at Westminster of the Bill amending the British North America Act. Mr. St-Laurent . . . remarked that it will be convenient if the representations referred to above arrived after the Bill had already become law . . .".
> 70. The Bill was passed in the House of Commons on 22 July and received the Royal Assent. On 23 July, the UK Government heard for the first time that the opposition from "some citizens in Ottawa and elsewhere" was in fact the opposition of the Premier of Quebec with the unanimous approval of the members of the Quebec legislature. A Dominions Office internal minute, dated 23 July 1943, states that the relevant telegram from a Canadian MP "very fortunately reached us after the Bill had passed both Houses... We had not heard previously of the [Quebec Government's opposition]". The minute continues:

> "It is doubtful whether any reply to the telegram is desirable. It is not proper that an individual Canadian MP should communicate direct with the United Kingdom Government in a matter of this kind. The position might be different if the Premier or Government of Quebec had addressed us on the subject though, even in that case, it should be noted that the established principle is that the United Kingdom Government have no direct dealings with Canadian Provincial Governments and communicate with them only through the Canadian Government... As was mentioned in the debate yesterday, it is anomalous that the United Kingdom Parliament should be called upon to deal with such questions, seeing that these must imply some measure of responsibility on the part of Parliament here in what is purely a Canadian matter..."

71. Accordingly, on 22 September 1943, the UK High Commissioner in Canada sent to the Canadian Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs an "informal note" expressing the UK Government's disquiet at the events of July. The main paragraph of the note is as follows:

> "Generally, it seems unreasonable that at this stage of constitutional development the United Kingdom Parliament should afford the sole means of amending the Canadian Constitution, since it is clear that it cannot effectively discuss the merits of the case. The suggestion has been made that the United Kingdom authorities should represent to the Canadian Government that the procedure adopted on this occasion was derogatory to the United Kingdom Parliament and might indeed be the cause of serious friction in the future. But the position is that express provision to maintain the existing practice in this respect was made in the Statute of Westminster in a special clause, the form of which was drawn by Canadian authorities as the result of a formal conference between the Federal and Provincial Governments. Accordingly, the United Kingdom do not wish to make anything like a formal approach on the subject as to the unsuitability of the present position. At the same time they hope that the Canadian authorities will realize that inappropriateness and possible risks involved" [sic] "in the present position. They take the view that the present practice has become increasingly anomalous and likely to lead to friction and they feel that, at any rate as soon as the war is over, the Canadian authorities may wish to find some method of amending the Canadian Constitution by action taken in Canada."

It is really quite extraordinary that a man like Mr. St-Laurent, in referring to opposition to the amendment as coming from "some citizens in Ottawa and elsewhere", obviously felt it advisable to apparently be somewhat less than frank with the U.K. High Commissioner in order to conceal the fact that the Quebec government and legislature were opposed, so that the U.K. Parliament would rush the amendment through in two days and they wouldn't know about the Quebec opposition until too late. This would indicate to me that Mr. St-Laurent was worried that the U.K. Parliament might pay some attention to opposition from a province if they knew about it. It also certainly shows that, even back in 1943, the U.K. Government was worried that they might find themselves in the position they are in today, and wanted to avoid it.

The Kershaw report stated at page xxxvi, that:

> "Both Mr. E. Lapointe, who as (Liberal) Minister of Justice attended the Conferences of 1926 and 1929, and Mr. H. Guthrie, who as (Conservative) Minister of Justice attended the Conferences of 1930 and 1931, stated in the Canadian House of Commons (in 1931 and 1935 respectively) that the UK Parliament could, and probably would, reject a Canadian request affecting Provincial rights if made without Provincial concurrence."

Honourable senators, that is not what Mr. Lapointe said. The Kershaw report has glossed over a critical distinction. According to the footnote at the bottom of the page, Mr. Lapointe actually said:

> "—the Imperial Parliament is not really a dominating power; it acts as trustee and as a guarantor, and merely gives effect to the will of the Canadian people... I think that amendments to the constitution could be divided into two classes; first those which would affect the provinces, which would add powers to the federal parliament and in that way affect provincial rights. In such cases surely the British Parliament, even under the situation as it exists to-day, would not agree to pass a law to effect the change... on the question of the respective jurisdiction of the Dominion and the provinces, there is no doubt that this could not be changed by either without agreement with the other."

As far as I am concerned, the most important and relevant words are, "which would add powers to the federal parliament". Mr. St-Laurent made the same point in 1943 when he was Minister of Justice, and said:

> "to change the allocation of legislative or administrative jurisdiction as between the provinces, on the one hand, and the Federal Parliament on the other, it could not probably be done without the consent of the organism that was set up by the constitution to have powers that would assuredly be taken from that organism."

Mr. St-Laurent then specifically referred to the B.N.A. Act, 1940, where unemployment insurance was transferred from provincial to federal jurisdiction.

In the quotation of Mr. Trudeau's mentioned by Senator Thompson, Mr. Trudeau refers to the practice of the federal government seeking the unanimous consent of the provinces "before seeking amendments that have affected the distribution of powers."

I personally think that this makes all the difference in the world as to how the amending process should be handled. This resolution does not propose to add to the powers of the federal Parliament any powers taken from the provinces that they presently have under the B.N.A. Act. The federal government has very carefully stayed very clear of any question of division of powers. Those will only be handled under the amending formula and in Canada. In view of the fact that the federal government has a power of disallowance over provincial legislation, which it can use if provincial legislation did offend fundamental rights of the kind contained in a bill of rights, then provincial legislatures can be curbed even now in this area by the federal government, even though the power of disallowance has fallen into disuse. In fact, it has not been used since 1943, but it was used 112 times before that.

• (1720)

In Bill C-60 the federal government offered to give up the power of disallowance with respect to those provinces that agreed to the entrenchment of a Charter of Rights. The limitation on the powers of the provincial legislatures imposed by a judicially interpreted Charter of Rights surely affects their powers less than the discretionary power of the federal government to interfere at will by disallowance. I might also interject at this point that the powers of disallowance and reservation contained in the B.N.A. Act, together with the declaratory power, emergency power and the spending power of the federal government, really negates the sovereignty theory that some people and some judges claim, without proper qualification, that the provincial legislatures possess.

It was as the result of a unanimous request of all the provinces, as well as the federal government, that section 7(1) of the Statute of Westminster was enacted which left the amending power in the hands of the U.K. government. No attempt was made to define the principle upon which the U.K. Parliament would act. It was because no agreement could be reached upon an amending formula by the provincial and federal governments that there was no such definition. If it had been possible to agree upon what circumstances the U.K. Parliament would act, then that would have been the equivalent of an agreement upon an amending formula and the Constitution could have been patriated. Surely, by no stretch of the imagination could the provinces have thought that in all cases, such as a drastic revision of the division of powers between the federal and provincial parliaments in the federal government's favour, the U.K. Parliament would automatically rubber-stamp the request of the federal Parliament. The provinces did regard the U.K. Parliament as some form of protection, and that is why they agreed to leave the power there, as they had no intention of agreeing to permit the federal Parliament to amend it at its will.

Honourable senators, I agree with the Kershaw Committee in its conclusion:

> It would not be in accord with the established constitutional position for the U.K. Government and Parliament to accept unconditionally the constitutional propriety of every request coming from the Canadian Parliament.

What I do not completely agree with is the Kershaw Committee's conclusion that:

> —the U.K. Parliament's fundamental role in these matters is to decide whether or not a request conveys the clearly expressed wishes of Canada as a whole bearing in mind the federal character of the Canadian constitutional system.

They have, in my opinion, such a role only when the federal Parliament is trying to take away significant powers from the provinces to add them to its own powers.

In the body of its report, the Kershaw Committee overlooked the critical distinction drawn by Mr. Lapointe when he said that it was with respect to amendments "which would add powers to the federal parliament and in that way affect provincial rights" that "surely the British Parliament even under the situation as it exists to-day, would not agree to pass a law to effect the change."

This is not the situation with respect to the amendments to the B.N.A. Act we are considering today. The government has been very careful not to increase the powers of the federal Parliament with respect to the powers given to the provinces under section 92 or other sections of the B.N.A. Act. It is obvious to me that the government does not think it would be proper to do so, except in compliance with some amending formula then in place, unless it had the substantial concurrence of the provincial governments or their people as determined by a referendum.

To digress for a moment, I cannot see what all the objections are to the use of referenda in the constitutional amending process. Experience in Australia, where the only way their constitution can be amended is by way of a referendum provided for in a bill passed by the federal Parliament, is that since 1901 there have been some 28 referenda held, representing some 50 proposed constitutional amendments. On only six of these referenda have the requested majorities been obtained, thus enacting a mere nine out of 50 proposed amendments into law, each a relatively simple proposal not bringing about any fundamental change in the division of powers.

Incidentally, the federal government in Australia completely controls the conduct of referenda. Switzerland also uses referenda to approve amendments to its constitution. The Swiss vote down most constitutional amendments, particularly if they propose to broaden the jurisdiction of the federal government. The federal penal code took 24 years of referenda before it was finally approved.

While I do not believe, judging by the Australian and Swiss experience, that referenda ordinarily will serve any useful purpose, there is always the possibility that they might, and for this reason I approve of the present proposals.

I was somewhat surprised at one of the arguments given by Senator Thompson in opposing referenda, that is, "the inability of ordinary citizens to have the time to study complex issues." That is the kind of argument I would expect from a right-wing elitist who does not really believe in democracy, and Senator Thompson is certainly not one of those.

I think that this is the appropriate point at which to say that this process by which we are acquiring a Charter of Rights binding upon the provinces does worry me. Some honourable senators may recall that on January 29, 1979 I gave a speech in this house on the question of whether a Bill of Rights should be entrenched in the Constitution. I will not repeat what I said then, except to summarize my conclusions, which were, incidentally, influenced by the evidence of the Honourable J. C. McRuer, former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario, and Professor Walter Tarnopolsky, the president of the Civil Rights Association of Canada, given before the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution.

My opinion, then—which I have amplified somewhat since—was that while we should have a Charter of Rights in the Constitution, binding on the federal and provincial parliaments, it need only be semi-entrenched as far as the provinces are concerned, in view of the opposition of a majority of the provincial parliaments. If it was in the Constitution, it would clearly have an overriding effect on all other legislation which was desirable. I would not allow the provinces to amend it, but I would allow them to override it with respect to specific legislation where it was clearly desirable to do so because the Supreme Court of Canada had gone off the rails in one of its decisions with respect to that legislation and public opinion clearly thought so and approved of a correction of this decision.

I would have given the power to the provincial governments to correct the way the Supreme Court of Canada interpreted the Charter of Rights with respect to specific legislation by being able to re-pass that legislation with a "notwithstanding" clause in it; that is, the legislation would have effect notwithstanding the Charter of Rights or, more particularly, notwithstanding the way the Supreme Court of Canada interpreted it. However, I would not have given them such power with respect to language rights because the provinces have all previously agreed to that.

I thought, and still think, my suggestion, which I modestly refer to as the "Godfrey formula", is a reasonable compromise that would have met the fundamental objections of some of the premiers to an entrenched Charter of Rights; namely, that the legislatures and not the courts should be, in the last resort, responsible for protecting our liberties. Premier Blakeney, in his brief to the special joint committee, said:

> With the entrenchment many of the most important and sensitive public policy decisions are delegated irretrievably to the courts. Courts, of course, are partially responsible now for administering federal and provincial human rights codes, but their decisions are not beyond popular review through legislative action.

In view of the overwhelming support of the public for the concept of fundamental freedoms, the provincial legislatures would be very cautious indeed about using a "notwithstanding" clause. The present federal Bill of Rights, for which Mr. Diefenbaker was responsible, also had a "notwithstanding" clause in it which has only been used once, and then in 1970 in connection with the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act which replaced the War Measures Act. I understand that the present Alberta Bill of Rights has a "notwithstanding" clause that has never been used. I would also allow each province to opt in to entrenchment of the Charter of Rights, which they might well do eventually, particularly after they have had some experience with it and how the Supreme Court of Canada interprets it.

I want to say to Senator Thompson that I have done just as much worrying as to how I should vote as he has, and for just as long as he. I did not really definitely make up my mind until after I had done all the research necessary for the preparation of this speech. I do not recognize, and never have, any obligation on any Liberal senator to follow any so-called Liberal whip.

On that subject, I would like to quote Senator Dandurand, when he became government leader in the Senate in 1922, and I remind honourable senators that he remained Liberal leader in the Senate for 20 years:

> I shun party discipline and the party whip. I invite criticism of the measures of the government, criticism from the right as well as from the left; I feel it is the responsibility of each senator to try to improve the legislation that comes before us.

I might say that in my more than seven years in this chamber, neither the leader of my party in the Senate nor the whip has ever attempted on any individual basis to influence my vote. That does not mean, of course, that we do not collectively get exhortations in the Senate Liberal caucus from the government leader in the Senate, from time to time, to follow the party line, and I am comfortable in doing so in most cases because, of course, it is in those cases right.

• (1730)

As between no Charter of Rights in the Constitution and no patriation with an amending formula and an entrenched Charter of Rights together with patriation of the B.N.A. Act with an amending formula, I have finally come to the conclusion, in spite of my strong reservations about the process, that patriating the Constitution is all important, is long overdue, and should be done now, even though it includes a Charter of Rights which is completely entrenched, which I do not really think is necessary at this time.

Let us get this first step over with, so that we can get on with amending the Constitution at home with respect to other important matters, such as the division of powers. I am, therefore, going to hold my nose and vote for this resolution.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL FINANCE

MEDIA COVERAGE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Douglas D. Everett, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be permitted to allow the visual and broadcast media to cover the meeting of the said Committee tomorrow, Thursday, 12th March, 1981.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Before the motion is put, honourable senators, may I make one or two comments? I am quite prepared to support the motion, for the very good reason that we will have the pleasure of listening to members of the other place, who happen to be members of the cabinet as well, announce that they intend to adopt an important recommendation made by a Senate committee after many years of study. I am a member of that committee, but I hasten to say that I had nothing to do with the recommendation itself, because it was formulated before my arrival on the scene.

I just want to point out that I believe that it constitutes something of an unusual occasion that the work of a Senate committee should be substantiated in such a way by the proposal that its recommendations be accepted in respect of the operations of a government department. All other recommendations of ours are accepted by government as a whole. So this seems to me to be something of a rather special nature.

I am therefore glad to support the motion, and I congratulate my predecessors on that committee, particularly the chairman, for their achievement.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Roblin for his generous remarks, but I must add that, although I have moved the motion, we cannot be sure that the broadcast or visual media will attend the meeting. Nevertheless, if they do, we think that would be a prime time for them to follow the proceedings of the committee. The meeting will start at 1.15 tomorrow afternoon and it will be over at 2 o'clock. The witnesses will be the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Public Works.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

ADDRESS

OF

RONALD WILSON REAGAN
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

TO

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

IN THE

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

ON

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 11, 1981

The President was welcomed by the Right Honourable P. E. Trudeau, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Jean Marchand, Speaker of the Senate and Honourable Jeanne Sauvé, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Speaker of the House of Commons): May I call this meeting to order?

Mr. President, we are grateful for the great honour you do us in addressing this joint session of the Senate and the House of Commons. I now invite the Right Honourable the Prime Minister to introduce our distinguished guest.

Right Hon. P.E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Madam Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. President and Mrs. Reagan, distinguished American visitors, honourable members of the Senate, members of the House of Commons, Excellencies, Mesdames et Messieurs:

Mr. President, yesterday I welcomed you to Canada. I repeat that welcome now because in this chamber Canada's democracy finds its ultimate expression. Here, in a special way, we speak on behalf of the people of Canada, and here the people of Canada are honoured to receive you, sir.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Nations do not choose their neighbours; geography does that. The sense of neighbourhood, however, is more than a product of geography; it is a creation of people who may live as far apart as California and Quebec. It is what makes neighbours of Canada and Mexico, for instance. Canadians have noted this sense in you, Mr. President, and they know that it gives a particular meaning to your visit to Ottawa.

[Translation]

Our being neighbours is not simply a matter of geography, it is a state of mind. Beyond North America lies the New World which we inhabit by your side. We share the dreams which have made this continent a beacon in the night and a haven of hope for mankind. We share the courage and the love for work which have enabled us to build side by side two great federal states stretching from the Atlantic coast to the distant shores of the Pacific. Our accomplishment is dear to us. We are intent on preserving our heritage, but at the same time we gladly agreed to share with others the prosperity and freedom we found in this land.

[English]

It is right that we should celebrate what we hold in common. At the same time it is necessary that we remember and respect what makes us different.

More than 200 years ago our paths diverged, although our goals remained the same. You created a great republic with a presidential system. We evolved as a constitutional monarchy, under a parliamentary system. You placed yourselves from the outset under a written constitution that you continue to revere today. We are only now finishing the work of writing ours and bringing it home. You fought a tragic civil war. We have recently undergone the experience of a referendum that involved no violence, but nonetheless touched the very fibre of this country.

The differences of history affect our relations today, because they affect our perceptions, our approaches, our priorities. You, Mr. President, would perhaps agree with Thoreau where he says of the United States government:

This government of itself never furthered any enterprise, but by the alacrity with which it got out of its way. It does not settle the west. It does not educate. The character inherent in the American people has done all that has been accomplished.

The character of the Canadian people, Mr. President, has also made Canada. But here in Canada our own realities have sometimes made it necessary for governments to "further enterprise". Those realities and that necessity are still with us today.

[Translation]

Mr. President, you are visiting Canada at a particularly turbulent time in our history. We are in the process of completing the construction of our country. As an American you will appreciate the challenge which we must face. We are attempting to improve our democratic system and to cement our unity. Undoubtedly the din of our labour will reach your ears. However, I can assure you that our stormy but productive discussions will pave the way for a stronger Canada. Indeed, if I may recall a humorist's description of a megalopolis, we have decided that at the close of our current debates we will be "more than a confederation of shopping centres".

In the years to come the United States will be looking at a dynamic neighbour to the North. By putting its own house in order Canada will grow confident in itself. We will establish more clearly where our interests lie and we will pursue them with renewed vigour. One thing will remain unchanged, however: our deep friendship for the United States. In fact, Mr. President, the relations between our two countries will grow at the same time as Canada will grow. Of course, as neighbours we will hold frank discussions. But we have always spoken clearly to each another and our openness was based on mutual respect, as befits two sovereign and equal countries linked by deep frienship.

[English]

Mr. President, you take on your awesome responsibilities at a time of stress and crisis in international affairs. The world badly needs the courage and wisdom of the United States, that courage that it can provide under your leadership, Sir. I speak for all Canadians when I say we are ready to work with you in the cause of stability, security, and humanity.

Your task, our joint task, will not be an easy one. Many people fear that the world has become too complicated, that events have spiralled beyond the control of individuals or governments. They are tempted to give up, to opt out, and to hide from reality and responsibility. That way lies oblivion.

I believe we must neither cower before reality nor oversimplify it. Yet complexity should not obscure plain truth. On this most favoured of continents we cannot simply turn our gaze inwards and ignore poverty, ignorance, and injustice elsewhere.

To the east, Mr. President, we face a system that seems ill-designed to respond to change and growth. Nevertheless, the Soviet Union and the eastern European states may come to accommodate themselves at least to the dynamics of their own region. If, for example, the Polish people are able to work out their own destiny within a framework accepted by their neighbours, then they will have matched revolution with a no less remarkable evolution. Through courage and restraint they will have begun the process of making their reality more Polish and their system more responsive, more adaptable, and ultimately more stable.

In the west, Mr. President, we have a long familiarity with the pressures of change. In the past decade our economies have undergone a severe test as trusted assumptions have been found wanting. In the 1970s we were buffeted by the rude shock of rapid energy price increases. We were forced to recognize that the old monopoly of economic power was coming to an end. And yet, for all the strains upon us, our political and economic framework has survived, survived at least as well as the chicken and the neck to which Winston Churchill once referred to this chamber.

Each of the western countries has met the challenge of change in its own way. Since all of us have our own distinctive economic strengths and weaknesses, our solutions have had to be diverse. We have found no simple answers; we have fashioned no single way. With co-operation and consultation, however, we have been able to complement our various approaches.

At another level, though, we do have a single approach. Let there be no doubt about our unity in the defence of our most precious heritage—that democracy which is envied by those who rightly crave it and feared by those who wrongly deny its force.

As to north and south, we are not dismayed by the complexity of the problems. The poverty of the developing countries does not have to be permanent, nor is it unalloyed. The gap between the two groups is neither racial nor unbridgeable. In the growth of the oil producing states, in the vigour of the newly industrialized countries, there is convincing evidence of the dynamism and potential of the developing world. In the unity of the "south", there is not so much an identity of circumstances as an idea, a point of view, a shared sense of injustice. The poorer peoples are at the mercy of circumstances that leave them out of balance, often out of hope, and too often vulnerable to opportunities who come poaching in troubled waters. The industrialized democracies have not only a human duty but a strategic obligation to help developing countries in their struggle, their survival, and their success.

Mr. President, humanity will prevail. We in the new world can never be pessimists, for we are in a very real sense the custodians of the future. You have reminded us of this, Sir, on both sides of the 49th parallel. You have done so by evoking a past in which both our peoples have been the architects of change, not its victims.

I wish you well in your task and comfort in your burden. May part of that comfort come from the assurance of Canada's abiding friendship for your country and for your people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ronald W. Reagan (President of the United States): Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Madam Speaker of the House of Commons, honourable Senators, members of the House of Commons, distinguished members of the diplomatic corps, ladies and gentlemen:

I came to this great capital of this great nation by crossing a border not which divides us, but a border which joins us.

[Text]

Nous nous sommes souvent serré la main par-dessus cette frontière et nous le faisons une fois encore aujourd'hui.

Des voix: Bravo!

[English]

For those of my own party who accompanied me, I have said that we have often shaken hands across this border and we are doing it once again today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: Nancy and I have arrived for this, the first state visit of my Presidency, in the spirit expressed so well by a Calgary writer and publisher some 60 years ago. He said that the difference between a friend and an acquaintance is that a friend helps where an acquaintance merely advises.

We come here not to advise, not to lecture. We are here to listen and to work with you. We are here as friends, not as acquaintances.

Some years ago Nancy and I both belonged to a very honourable profession in California. And as I prepared for these remarks today, I learned that among those in the motion picture industry in Hollywood it has been estimated that perhaps as many as one out of five are of Canadian origin.

Many of those whom I counted as close professional colleagues, indeed close personal friends, did not come from America's heartland as I did, but from the heart of Canada, as did most of you in this historic chamber.

Art Linkletter, Glenn Ford, Raymond Massey, Walter Pidgeon and Raymond Burr are but a few of your countrymen who are celebrated in our entertainment industry.

I believe I know the very special relationship between Canada and the United States. But with all respect to those few I have mentioned, I can do better than that. A young lady once came to Hollywood from Toronto. Before long, little Gladys Smith was embraced by our entire nation. Gladys Smith of Toronto became Mary Pickford. And I know you will forgive us for adopting her so thoroughly that she became known the world over as "America's sweetheart".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: America's sweetheart was Canadian.

Affinity, heritage, common borders, mutual interests—these have all built the foundation for our strong bilateral relationship. This relationship has grown to include some of the strongest economic links among the nations on this earth.

Some 16 per cent of America's total world trade is done with Canada. Our joint trade amounts to about $90 billion Canadian, annually. This is greater than the gross national product of some 150 countries.

It's estimated that three quarters of a million United States workers are employed in exports to Canada and, in turn, Canadian exports to the United States account for one sixth of your gross national product.

Not only is the vast bulk of this trade conducted between private traders in two free economic systems, but more than half crosses our borders duty free. Our seaways, highways, airways and rails are the arteries of a massive, interconnecting trade network which has been critically important to both of us.

Thus, while America counts many friends across the globe, surely we have no better friend than Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: And though we share bilateral interests with countries throughout the world, none exceeds the economic, cultural and security interests that we sahre with you.

These strong and significant mutual interests are among the reasons for my visit here. Already I have shared with Prime Minister Trudeau very helpful discussions across a range of issues, to listen and to ensure that these important ties shall not loosen.

I am happy to say that in the recent past we have made progress on matters of great mutual importance. Our governments have already discussed one of the largest joint private projects ever undertaken by two nations—the pipeline to bring Aslaskan gas to the continental United States. We strongly favour prompt completion of this project based on private financing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: We have agreed to an historic liberalization of our trade in the Toyko Round of the multilateral trade negotiations.

We have continued our efforts, begun with the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement of 1972, to protect our joint heritage in the Great Lakes. We want to continue to work co-operatively to understand and control the air and water pollution that respects no borders.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: During my visit here, I have had the pleasure of participating in the conclusion of two other important agreements. We are renewing the North American Aerospace Defence Command Agreement for five more years. For more than two decades now, NORAD has bound us together in our common defence with an integrated command structure symbolizing our interdependence. This agreement represents continued progress in our relations and mutual security.

Second, we have concluded an agreement regarding social security benefits for those of our citizens who combine work in both nations. With this new agreement, those people who are employed in both countries can be eligible for the combined benefits, and the workers will be eligible for those benefits in whichever country they choose to live.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: Our deep and long time bilateral economic interests lead me to depart from the norm today and give to you a report on America's progress toward economic recovery.

Five weeks ago, I reported to the American people that the U.S. economy faced the worst economic mess since the great world-wide depression. We are a proud people, but we are also realists. The time has come for us to face up to what I described as a potential economic calamity.

I raise this issue today because America holds a genuine belief in its obligation to consult with its friends and neighbours. The economic actions we take affect not just us alone but the relationships across our borders as well.

As we examined America's economic illness, we isolated a number of contributing factors. Our federal government has grown explosively in a very short period of time. We found that there had grown up a maze of stifling regulations which began to crush initiative and deaden the dynamic industrial innovation which brought us to where we are. We saw unbelievable deficits, this year alone reaching up to nearly $80 billion, including off budget items.

We found that these deficits got in no one's way because the government found it easy to fuel inflation by printing more money just to make up the difference.

The American taxing structure, the purpose of which was to serve the people, began instead to serve the insatiable appetite of government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: If you will forgive me, someone has once likened the government to a baby: it is an alimentary canal with an appetite at one end and no sense of responsibility at the other!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: Our citizens were being thrown into higher tax brackets for simply trying to keep pace with inflation. In just the last five years, federal personal taxes for the average American household have increased 58 per cent. The results: crippling inflation, interest rates which went above 20 per cent, a national debt approaching a trillion dollars, nearly eight million people out of work, and a steady three-year decline in productivity.

We decided not just to complain but to act. In a series of messages and actions, we have begun the slow process of stopping the assault on the American economy and returning to the strong and steady prosperity that we once enjoyed.

It is very important for us to have our friends and partners know and understand what we are doing. Let me be blunt and honest. The United States in the last few years has not been as solid and stable an ally and trading partner as it should be. How can we expect certain things of our friends if we don't have our own House in order?

Americans are uniting now as they always have in times of adversity. I have found there is a wellspring of spirit and faith in my country which will drive us forward to gain control of our lives and restore strength and vitality to our economic system. But we act not just for ourselves, but to enhance our relationships with those we respect.

First, we are taking near revolutionary steps to cut back the growth in federal spending in the United States. We are proposing that instead of having our national budget grow at the unacceptable rate of 14 per cent per year, it should rise at a more sensible 6 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: This enables us to maintain the kind of growth we need to protect those in our society who are truly dependent on government services.

Just yesterday, I submitted our proposed budget for the coming year, and then immediately crossed the border.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Reagan: With extraordinary effort we have isolated some 83 items for major savings and hundreds more for smaller savings, which together amount to $48.6 billion in the coming fiscal year.

Our second proposal is a 10 per cent cut across the board every year for three years in the tax rates for all individual income taxpayers, making a total cut in tax rates of 30 per cent. This will leave our taxpayers with $500 billion more in their pockets over the next five years and create dramatic new incentives to boost productivity and fight inflation. When these personal cuts are combined with tax cuts to provide our business and industry with new capital for innovation and growth, we will be creating millions of new jobs many of them, ultimately, on your side of the border.

Our third proposal is to eliminate those unproductive and unnecessary regulations which have slowed down our growth and added to our inflationary burdens.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: We shall do this with care, while still safeguarding the health and safety of the American people—and, I might add, while mindful of our responsibility to have equal regard for the health and safety of our neighbours.

Finally, we will be working closely with our federal reserve system to achieve stable and moderate growth patterns in our money supply.

As I said, America's program for economic recovery is designed not merely to solve an internal problem. It is viewed by my administration as part of an essential effort to restore the confidence of our friends and allies in what we are doing.

When we gain control of our inflation, we can once again contribute more helpfully to the health of the world economy. We believe that confidence will rise, interest rates will decline, and investment will increase. As our inflation is reduced, your citizens and other world citizens will have to import less inflation from us.

As we begin to expand our economy once again and as our people begin to keep more control of their own money, we will be better trading partners. Our growth will help fuel the steady prosperity of our friends.

The control we regain over our tax and regulatory structures will have the effect of restoring steady growth in U.S. productivity. Our goods will go into markets not laden down with the drag of regulatory baggage or punitive levies, but with a competitive edge that helps us and those who trade with us.

Such new sustained prosperity, in an era of reduced inflation, will also serve world-wide to help all of us resist protectionist impulses. We want open markets. We want to promote lower costs globally. We want to increase living standards throughout the world. That is why we are working so hard to bring about this economic renewal.

There are, of course, other very important reasons for us to restore our economic vitality. Beyond our shores and across this troubled globe the good word of the United States, and its ability to remain stable and dependable, rely in good part on our having a stable and dependable economy.

Projecting solid internal strengths is essential to the west's ability to maintain peace and security in the world. Thus, our national interests, our bilateral interests and our hemispheric interests are profoundly involved in truly international questions.

That's why we must act now, why we can no longer be complacent about the consequences of economic deterioration. We have entered an era which commands the alliance to restore its leadership in the world. And before we can be strong in the world, we must be once again strong at home.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: Our friend, our ally, our partner, and our neighbour, Canada, and the United States have always worked together to build a world with peace and stability, a world of freedom and dignity for all people.

Now, with our other friends, we must embark with great spirit and commitment on the path toward unity and strength.

On this side of the Atlantic, we must stand together for the integrity of our hemisphere, for the inviolability of its nations, for its defence against imported terrorism, and for the rights of all our citizens to be freed from the provocations triggered from outside our sphere for malevolent purposes.

Across the oceans, we stand together against the unacceptable Soviet invasion into Afghanistan and against continued Soviet adventurism across the earth.

And toward the oppressed and dispirited people of all nations, we stand together as friends ready to extend a helping hand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: I say to you, our Canadian friends—and to all nations who will stand with us for the cause of freedom—our mission is more than simply making do in an untidy world. Our mission is what it has always been—to lift the world's dreams beyond the short limits of our sights and to the far edges of our best hopes.

This will not be an era of losing liberty; it shall be one of gaining it.

This will not be an era of economic pessimism, of restraint and retrenchment; it will be one of restoration, growth, and expanding opportunities for all men and women.

And we will not be here merely to survive; we will be here, in William Faulkner's words, to prevail—to regain our destiny and our mutual honour.

Sometimes it seems that, because of our comfortable relationship, we dwell perhaps a bit too much on our differences. I, too, have referred to the fact that we do not agree on all issues. We share so many things with each other; yet, for good reasons, we insist on being different to retain our separate identities.

This captured the imagination of Ernest Hemingway when he worked as a writer for the Toronto Star Weekly in 1922. Hemingway was travelling in Switzerland and he noted that the Swiss made no distinction between Canadians and citizens of the United States. He wondered about this and asked an hotelkeeper if he didn't notice any difference between the people from the two countries.

"Monsieur", he said to Hemingway, "Canadians speak English and always stay two days longer at any place than Americans do." As you know, I shall be returning to Ottawa in July and, if you don't mind, I'll plan to stay as long as everyone else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: I am not here today to dwell on our differences. When President Eisenhower spoke from this spot in 1953, he noted his gratitude as Allied Commander in World War II for the Canadian contribution to the liberation of the Mediterranean. This touched my curiosity, and even though I had participated in that war myself, I did a little research.

In the Second World War there was something called the 1st Special Service Force, a unique international undertaking at the time. This force was composed of Canadians and Americans distributed equally throughout its ranks, carrying the flags of both nations. They served under a joint command, were taught a hybrid close-order drill, and trained together as paratroopers, demolition experts, ski troops and, then, as an amphibious unit.

The 1st Special Service Force became famous for its high morale, its rugged abilities, and tough fighting in situations where such reputations were hard-earned. Alerted to their availability, General Eisenhower requested them for special reconnaissance and raiding operations during the winter advance up the Italian peninsula. They were involved in the Anzio beachhead campaign in Italy and were at the spearhead of the forces that captured Rome.

The 1st Special Service Force made no distinctions when it went into battle. Its men had the common cause of freedom at their side and the common denominator of courage in their hearts. They were neither Canadian nor American. They were, in General Eisenhower's term, liberators.

So let's speak no more of differences today. Certainly your Ambassador, Ken Taylor, didn't when he first sheltered, and then spirited, six Americans out of the centre of Tehran and brought them to their freedom.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: Their daring escape worked not because of our differences but because of our shared likenesses.

A final word to the people of Canada.

We are happy to be your neighbour; we want to remain your friend; we are determined to be your partner; and we are intent on working closely with you in a spirit of co-operation. We are much more than an acquaintance.

Merci. Thank you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[English]

Hon. Jean Marchand (The Speaker of the Senate): Mr. President, Mr. Prime Minister, Madam Speaker of the House of Commons:

To receive you in our capital and our Parliament represents for us, President and Mrs. Reagan, not only a great joy and singular honour, but also the visible assurance that our traditional ties of friendship hold strong despite international upheavals whose shock waves have not spared our own continent, forced as we are to march more and more in step with even the most far-flung regions of an increasingly interdependent world.

On behalf of the Senate of Canada, I would like to transmit our heartfelt gratitude that you have chosen, at this very earliest stage of your mandate, to reinforce the foundation of a unique relationship based not just on a common interest shared by our two peoples, but also on a common spirit and aspiration. While recognizing our differences and respective sovereignty and in full appreciation of our respective stature and resources, we know that we are natural allies and that only blindness, or at least a lack of vision, can threaten this bond.

[Translation]

By seeking common ground in our national viewpoints, we will not only be doing ourselves a mutual service, but also contributing to the betterment of life among our brothers in other nations. If our roles are sometimes different, they are nonetheless complementary and our goals must be the same. To paraphrase an old maxim: "We who imagine we can do without the world deceive ourselves greatly; but those who fancy that the world cannot do without them deceive themselves even more." Long live the United States of America, long live Canada, long live peace between men and between nations.

[English]

Thank you, Mr. President.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Mr. President, you have accorded Canada the distinction of being the recipient of your first official visit as President of the United States. We are touched by this honour which strengthens our awareness of the long-standing ties which link us to those we call our neighbours to the South.

Our peoples, diverse in their origins, share a history which has brought us together on a vast continent, one which both your people and ours have explored and developed. Our cultural influences derive from the same sources and unite us in a common civilization. We have, since our beginnings, built on the strength inherited from our pioneers, who were led by many different circumstances, political and economic, to the North American continent.

It goes without saying that an unfailing friendship exists between us. We applied ourselves to the task of building a prosperous country, inviting those elsewhere who sought adventure or aspired to live in freedom to come and settle with us.

From such a sequence of events, varied and often dramatic, the United States and Canada were born. While many similarities unite us, the differences we manifest are the signs of the distinct personalities which finally gave our countries their identity.

[Translation]

When we look to the United States, we see people that are industrious, dynamic, bold to the point of recklessness and that for a long time has been known for the scope of its discoveries and the uniqueness of its achievements. You explored space, walked on the moon and amazed the world by making dreams come true. This is proof of the spirit, enthusiasm, genius and perennial youth of America. Throughout the world, people look to you not only for inspiration but also for help and advice.

[English]

For our part, we have profited from your energy and dynamism. Our destiny, no matter how we view it, is closely tied to yours in our pursuit of individual freedom and the promotion of the social and economic betterment of our peoples. The contacts between us are many and varied. Both our countries wish to maintain their respective identities while working together, each in a different way, to build a universal civilization. Your culture, your arts, your literature, your science and your technology are marvellously impressive. Our lives have been enriched by them and they have inspired our own efforts. Your example is an encouragement to us, as Canadians, to marshal our physical and intellectual resources towards the creation of a society which reflects our essential Canadian character.

Mr. President, we have listened to you with great interest. We have paid close attention to your comments, mindful of the fact that you mean to lead your country along the paths which appear to you to be the best; and that you will do so with boldness, honesty and sincerity.

As has always been the case in the past, we shall be happy to find ourselves at your side in meeting the challenges which face us all. We shall co-operate with you, and with other countries, whenever the need arises, in promoting universal well-being and protecting the peace of the world.

Mr. President, Mrs. Reagan, in expressing our thanks and appreciation, we ask you also to accept our assurance of the respect and friendship which we feel for you and your country.

I now adjourn this meeting.

THE SENATE

Thursday, March 12, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Exchange of Notes between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States of America relating to the renewal of the Agreement on the North America Air Defence Command (NORAD). Done at Ottawa, March 11, 1981. Entered into force May 12, 1981.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

MR. HANS J. DE KOSTER, PRESIDENT, PARLIAMENTARY ASSEMBLY OF THE COUNCIL OF EUROPE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I draw your attention to the presence in the South Gallery of the President of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, Mr. de Koster.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

JUDGES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, March 12, 1981

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to which was referred Bill C-34, intituled: "An Act to amend the Judges Act and certain other Acts in consequence thereof", has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of Wednesday, March 11, 1981, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

H. Carl Goldenberg
(Chairman)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave, I move that this bill be read the third time now.

• (1405)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: No. I believe I should explain my reasons.

I do not see any reason why we cannot follow the rules in this case, and consider third reading at the next sitting of the Senate. No effort has been made to show that there is urgency. The bill in question has retroactive effect so no one is going to suffer from a few days' delay, and since we discussed it for the first time only yesterday rushing it through is rather unseemly. That is why I said no.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I recognize that Senator Godfrey has refused leave, but since he was allowed to explain his refusal I ask permission to explain why I am asking for third reading at this time.

I can understand Senator Godfrey's feeling that it is unseemly to give third reading to any bill, with leave. The principle which he has enunciated would apply to any bill. The reason why I am asking for leave to move the third reading of this bill now is, as the records of both the Senate and the other place will show, that this matter has been before Parliament and before various governments and studied in its various forms for some years. It is our position, as I said during the debate, that this bill is long overdue.

Senator Godfrey may think it would appear more seemly to give the impression that we are all going home for the weekend to think of little else but the Judges Act, but that seems to me to be silly. I think we should give this bill third reading now, because it is so long overdue and because it does not seem to me to be seemly to act as if it is unseemly to do so.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I do not believe that we should debate the granting of leave. If a senator says no, then it is no, and the motion cannot be put.

Honourable senators, when shall the bill be read a third time?

Senator Frith moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, March 17, 1981, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Honourable senators, if leave is given I would like to explain.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It will depend on John Godfrey.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, because of the backlog of speakers in the debate on the resolution respecting the Constitution, and because we have more business than was expected, we were looking forward to four sittings next week, and intended to move that the Senate adjourn until Monday night so that we could sit Monday night, Tuesday night, Wednesday afternoon and Thursday afternoon. I gave the impression that we would sit on Monday night to some honourable senators and particularly to our whip. I apologize to any honourable senators who made plans on the basis of being here on Monday evening.

● (1410)

After discussing the matter with Senator Flynn, we felt it would be advisable to have four sittings next week, but decided to try, next week at least, to have those four sessions by sitting on Tuesday afternoon, Tuesday evening, Wednesday afternoon and Thursday afternoon. That is the reason notice is given for 2 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon.

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the deputy leader? A meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is scheduled for Tuesday afternoon at 2.30. It has been quite difficult to arrange for the attendance of witnesses. Am I now supposed to call them and tell them they should not come? It is also impossible for me to schedule a meeting on Thursday morning, so my week is gone as far as this committee is concerned.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, serious problems for committees are caused whenever we sit on Tuesday afternoon, and I appreciate that fact. It was a reconciliation of some difficulties on both sides that led us to pick Tuesday afternoon. But the point raised by Senator Barrow illustrates how we always have trouble whenever we plan for sittings on Tuesday afternoons because the committees assume that that time is available to them.

Under the circumstances, I suggest we grant leave to the committee which made these plans for Tuesday afternoon to sit while the Senate is sitting.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, before we agree to that motion, may I, as the so-called co-ordinator of committees, say a word? Through no fault of the deputy leader but because I was absent from this building for the last three hours, I have just now learned of this new schedule.

We had four committees scheduled to sit on Tuesday afternoon. If I may be given leave, I would like to try, during the next hour, to shift the hours of those committee meetings. As I stated last year, due to the lack of space—and because of our staff requirements, we cannot have more than one committee sitting while the Senate is sitting. At the moment we have two committees sitting on Tuesday morning. We have four committees planning to sit on Tuesday afternoon. I suggest, if I may be given a little bit of leeway, that I try to arrange a meeting of one of those four committees on Tuesday morning, and that the Senate grant leave for one committee to sit at 1.30 in the afternoon on Tuesday, which committee will have to be determined by who the witnesses are. I also suggest that leave be granted for a second committee to meet at 4:30 on Tuesday afternoon, and for a fourth committee to meet while the Senate is sitting on Tuesday evening. In that way we would accommodate all four committees according to the space and the staff we have. I cannot at this moment say which committee will meet at which time, but if that is agreeable to the Senate, we will try to work it out during the next hour.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that appears to be reasonable, and I suggest we support that arrangement. I attempted to reach Senator Lafond, as he pointed out, and was unable to do so. The responsibility for the problem we are facing at this moment on this scheduling, and which we are, nevertheless, going to be able to work out, is mine. I had indicated to Senator Flynn that we would not be sitting on Mondays and Fridays until I had talked to him further about any need to do so. I did not give him sufficient notice to make any changes, and I should have, and that is why we are in this position. However, if we learn anything from this experience it is that if it is advisable for us to have four sittings a week while we are dealing with this constitutional matter and any other business, then it seems more suitable for us to sit on Monday evening, Tuesday evening, Wednesday afternoon and Thursday afternoon. If we find by this time next week, or by next Wednesday, that we shall need to sit four days the following week, then we shall be asking—and I make it quite clear now—to sit on Monday evening, Tuesday evening, Wednesday afternoon and Thursday afternoon of that week. That is subject to our feeling that we do need the four days—which we may or may not need—the following week.

● (1415)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have before me a motion, a proposal and a suggestion. I think we should first make a decision on the motion, which is whether the Senate will adjourn until next Tuesday at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: As for the other matters, honourable senators, I presume that there will be an agreement, because I have no formal motion before me.

Senator Flynn: When Senator Lafond returns to the chamber, we can give him leave to indicate the arrangements he has been able to make.

Senator Frith: I agree, honourable senators. The intention is for Senator Lafond to try to make those arrangements and then, before we adjourn this afternoon, to return to the chamber and ask for the necessary leave to implement whatever arrangements he has been able to make.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Tuesday next, 17th March, 1981, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thought it was quite clear that in the case of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce the arrangements referred to by its deputy chairman, Senator Barrow, were so rigidly fixed as to require that leave be given for that committee to sit. That was understood.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, that does involve a conflict, because the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance is also expecting a witness to appear before it at 1.30 on Tuesday afternoon. Would it not be better to allow Senator Lafond to make his own compromise among the committee chairmen before we begin giving leave to any committee to sit at a particular time?

Hon. Charles McElman: No particular time was mentioned in Senator Barrow's motion.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Douglas D. Everett, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Tuesday next, 17th March, 1981, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I have no objection to the National Finance Committee being given leave to sit so long as Senator Lafond has no objection, but I had understood that Senator Lafond could hardly accommodate two committees, and we have already given leave to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to sit while the Senate is sitting. So where does that leave us? Perhaps Senator Everett should postpone his motion until Senator Lafond has had a chance to discuss the situation with him.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I am sure that among Senator Lafond, Senator Barrow and myself we can work out a compromise with respect to times.

Senator Flynn: You can do that later.

Senator Everett: If we can have leave at this stage to sit on Tuesday, we can work out the times among ourselves and come back and report that to the Senate.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: It was precisely my purpose to obtain authority for three Senate committees to sit while the Senate is sitting on Tuesday, two in the afternoon and one in the evening. So long as the times are not determined, and those will have to be negotiated, I am not unhappy with the solution.

• (1420)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Perhaps Senator Everett's question should be put by his Honour the Speaker and then Senator Grosart may want to speak to it. Senator Everett's motion is that the committee have leave to sit on Tuesday while the Senate is sitting. I understand that Senator Lafond is agreeable to Senator Everett's motion. We are not specifying the time that any particular committee will sit.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Grosart, this time I hope you make it.

Hon. Allister Grosart: I was just going to suggest that perhaps we need leave for the Senate to sit while the committees are sitting!

Hon. Robert Muir: On a point of order, I trust that the members of the press are taking particular note of the difficulties with which Senator Lafond, the co-ordinator of committee meetings, is confronted because of the numerous committee sittings which have to be integrated with the sittings of the Senate. I hope the press will note that many Senate committees meet in order to study the affairs of this country, yet they never receive press coverage.

Motion agreed to.

ACCOMMODATION PROGRAM OF DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS —ACCEPTANCE OF COMMITTEE'S RECOMMENDATIONS— STATEMENT BY CHAIRMAN

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, before Question Period, may I have leave to make a statement?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has just concluded a meeting with the President of the Treasury Board, the Honourable Donald Johnston, and the Minister of Public Works, the Honourable Paul Cosgrove, in respect of their reply to the 62 recommendations that were made by the committee in its report on the Accommodation Program of Public Works.

I might say that the bulk of those recommendations have been accepted by the Government of Canada, and that they are in the course of being implemented.

Most especially, the meeting was called so that the ministers could announce the acceptance of revenue dependency in the operation of the Department of Public Works. I think it is best expressed by a statement filed with the committee by the Minister of Public Works, and, with leave of the Senate, I should like to read that statement.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Everett: The statement reads:

Mr. Chairman, honourable senators,

I would like to begin by thanking this committee for its hard work and serious counsel; without your effort we would not be about to embark down such an exciting—and challenging—road. The President of the Treasury Board of Canada and I know that you share our excitement in what will be an entirely new approach to managing a common service agency in government.

As you know, Public Works Canada is one of the largest construction and real property organizations in Canada. As such it has massive holdings of buildings and land in its own right, manages property for other government departments and agencies and provides millions of square metres of space for accommodation purposes.

The department, in seeking a type of improved management practice which would ensure "value for money", had our enthusiasm fired by this very committee when, in 1978, it recommended the need for changes in the management of government accommodation and in the operations of Public Works.

This committee and the Auditor General both suggested the department be run on a "revenue dependent" basis; and the Comptroller General's IMPAC study highlighted need for improvement in management practices and controls.

I would like to refer briefly to the 1978 report of your committee, which dealt with the accommodation program of Public Works.

On recommending that my department charge user departments market-equivalent rents for all general purpose accommodation, your committee reached the conclusion, I quote,

"That revenue dependency is feasible and desirable and (the committee) recommends that the accommodation program of Public Works be operated on this principle."

It is indeed with some relish that we can now report to you that Public Works is about to embark on developing systems that respond to the recommendations made by your committee. I feel it is most certainly the best way to manage a department that is to all intents and purposes a large realty company working within the aegis of the Government of Canada.

The decision by cabinet is significant in that it will establish a single system for managing accommodation. Within this system departments will pay rent for space and fees for services they obtain from Public Works.

Rental cash flow and related expenses would be accounted for in one revolving fund, while a second revolving fund would account for Public Works' fees and expenses. Public Works would be expected to rely on these fees to pay for its own operating and management costs.

Capital construction costs and the provision of some specialized services will continue to be funded through parliamentary appropriations.

Formal agreements will be encouraged between Public Works and our clients; these will delineate services to be rendered as to time of delivery, quality of service, costs, etc. There will thereby be an objective means of assessing whether or not Public Works is delivering as agreed.

● (1425)

The effect will be to create better service for our clients, will lead to better management and financial control, and to savings for the government, which are objectives I know the committee fully supports.

And in addition to that, I believe implicitly that the new mode of operation will also raise the morale of Public Works employees for, if we do good work, it will be readily apparent.

There is no way in which this changeover can take place immediately because of the lead time needed to design and install the commercial-type accounting systems and change the budgeting and estimates process. As new systems are developed they will be put in place, and simulated processes will be used to familiarize staff with these systems. A thorough evaluation of the complete system will take place according to terms of reference agreed to by officials of Treasury Board, Office of the Comptroller General, Privy Council and Public Works. Copies of these terms of reference are available for your information. The start-up of actual charging will be set by the government only after this evaluation is completed.

I want to thank publicly, first, those in my department who have labored to bring us so far, but even more so the members of this committee. Without your recommendations we would not be in a position to begin our drive to provide the most positive answer to the government's concern for improved administrative effectiveness.

Honourable senators, I also ask leave to append the introductory remarks of the President of the Treasury Board and a statement on the status of the implementation of the recommendations that were made in the report, most of which, as I have said, have been implemented.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

QUESTION PERIOD

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT POLICY RE SIGNING OF TREATIES WITH UNITED STATES

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in connection with comments made earlier this month, and especially yesterday, by the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning the attitude of Canada with regard to the negotiation of future treaties with the United States.

Mr. MacGuigan is reported, on page 8127 of Commons Hansard for yesterday, to have said:

> Certainly, our disposition at this point is that in a case where there is a question, because of the nature of the negotiations, that there might not be subsequent ratification by the Senate, to seek some kind of assurance from the senators in advance either in the form of a resolution, in the form of letters or in the form of direct assurances which are funnelled through the Secretary of State, to seek assurances from the U.S. Senate before the treaty is signed that it will be ratified by the Senate.

Earlier, the Honourable Allan Lawrence asked if the minister had any commitment that the U.S. Senate would ratify either one or both of those treaties. In reply, Mr. MacGuigan said:

> —I think that even if the United States administration were to offer a commitment at this point that the Senate would do something, we would treat that with a certain degree of scepticism. Obviously we could not have an assurance of that kind. All we have are assurances that the administration will do its best to secure that agreement.

Could the Leader of the Government provide some clarification on what the Secretary of State for External Affairs means by that kind of policy? Does he mean that we would not enter into any negotiation with the United States unless we have assurances that the U.S. Senate will eventually ratify any agreement we may reach with the U.S. administration? Is that the position we will henceforth take in our negotiations with the United States?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. It really deserves a formal type of reply. However, in the past there have been occasions when commitments made by the administration in the United States have subsequently not been supported by the actions of the U.S. Senate. Indeed, there are many significant historic examples of that. It is not a new phenomenon.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

The Leader of the Opposition has requested further explanation of the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am afraid that I do not wish to hazard an explanation because I have not been provided with a copy of that statement. However, with respect to the proposed fisheries treaty, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister did say yesterday, in reference to his conversations with the President:

● (1430)

> It began, of course, with an expression of our deep disappointment at the fact that the fisheries treaty had been withdrawn by the United States from ratification because from the outset we had argued, when these discussions began several years ago, that linkage between the boundaries settlement and the fisheries was not only necessary but it was obvious from the nature of the two agreements. And we are disappointed at the delinkage, and that has been expressed very clearly to the United States as I said in the House of Commons a few days ago, I think it fair to put the best possible light on this and that is certainly in keeping with the attitude the discussions assumed.
>
> The fisheries treaty was bogged down for a couple of years in the Senate—

Honourable senators are most certainly aware of that fact.

The Prime Minister continued:

> —and we view the United States gesture withdrawing that treaty as an indication of the determination to solve the problem in other ways because we made it quite clear that the two problems have to be solved, it is not just a matter of having the Courts determine the boundaries, it is a matter of making sure that though there will be no fish war, we gave each other the assurance of that, and we will take measures to make sure it does not happen.

With regard to seeking assurances from the Senate, I do not have further explanatory material from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but he will be requested to provide further amplification.

Senator Flynn: Does the Leader of the Government suggest that we should take the statement of the Prime Minister rather than that of the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not believe that the two statements are in conflict at all. Indeed, one of the features of this government is the remarkable degree of unanimity between ministers and the Right Honourable the Prime Minister.

Senator Flynn: If you say so.

An Hon. Senator: They are all yes men; they are unanimous.

THE CONSTITUTION

EFFECT OF PROPOSED CANADIAN CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS ON EXISTING LEGISLATION

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. It concerns the implications of the Charter of Rights included in the proposed resolution now under consideration in this assembly and in the other place about the laws of this Parliament and the provincial legislatures which are now in effect.

The Quebec government has asked three distinguished jurists, including a former judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Mr. Yves Pratte, to give their opinion "about the effects on Quebec laws and regulations of enshrining in the Canadian Constitution a Charter of Rights and Freedoms similar to that which is contained in the Constitution Bill, 1981," in view, for instance, of sub-section 58(1) of this bill which provides that any law of Parliament or of a province which is inconsistent with the provisions of this bill will have no force or effect.

My question is as follows: Has a similar study been made or sponsored by the Minister or the federal Department of Justice concerning the effect of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms on the federal laws, that is those passed by this Parliament?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice, honourable senator.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: In that case, if I may, I would like to further amplify my question so that we may receive some information which would be extremely useful in the present debate. If such a study has indeed been made, I would add the following question: Could this study be made available to the Senate and tabled in this assembly so that we may make full use of it in our discussions?

If the reply is "not as yet", I would rephrase my question for the future and ask instead: Does the Department of Justice intend to make such a study shortly?

[English]

EFFECT OF PROPOSED CANADIAN CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS ON LAW ENFORCEMENT

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. There has been concern expressed by Chief Ackroyd, of the Metropolitan Toronto Police, and other law enforcement officers that the exclusionary rule proposed in the Charter of Rights will create in Canada the type of serious problems encountered by U.S. law enforcement officers, in that all evidence that is illegally obtained is automatically excluded from admission in court, no matter how relevant it is to the issue of proving guilt.

Will the leader assure the Senate that the Charter of Rights will take into consideration the legitimate concerns expressed by law enforcement officers, whose past record and dedication we all respect?

Furthermore, I would like to invite the leader and honourable senators to read an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail on March 11, 1981, entitled, "The Pitfalls of Americanizing the Canadian Criminal Law," by Roderick McLeod, a spokesman for the Canadian Association of Crown Counsel and Assistant Deputy Attorney General of Ontario.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—CONSULTATION WITH OECD

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of State for Economic Development in connection with the obligations of Canada in respect of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development.

The Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, who was Secretary of State for External Affairs at the time, spoke on behalf of the government in Paris in June 1976 respecting Canada's commitment or subscription to investment issues and guidelines for multinational enterprises. After explaining the special position Canada takes in this matter with respect to the Canadianization of some aspects of our industry, if I may interpret it rather loosely, he concluded that Canada, is therefore in a position "to accept the declaration and the commitment to notify and consult." I direct your attention to that phrase, "the commitment to notify and consult."

Did the Government of Canada consider that it was necessary to notify and consult with the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development before the implementation of the National Energy Program?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice and will find out the details with respect to that.

I am sure my honourable friend understands, however, that there were some matters in connection with the National Energy Program which were announced in conjunction with the budget. Indeed, it is not normal to consult outside of government at any time with respect to budgetary matters when there are some tax changes which are announced to become effective on budget night.

In addition to taking the question as notice—and I will obtain a more complete answer—I can suggest to my honourable friend that we believe that, with respect particularly to energy, although there were some other things that the minister alluded to, we asked for and obtained some exceptions to the principle because of the special nature and the size of foreign investment in Canada.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have the statement that the minister made at the time in front of me, so I am aware of his comments in respect of that. However, my point is not in connection with those exceptions which he made. I am concerned about what "the commitment to notify and consult" really means. If the minister could enlighten me on that point, we might then be able to follow the activities of the government since the budget was announced, because, after all, that took place last October. If there is a commitment, no doubt it has been fulfilled by this time. I would be interested in knowing the answer to my question.

Senator Olson: I will take that as notice, honourable senator.

● (1440)

LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE—FISHING PERMITS

Hon. Guy Williams: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Having spent many days in the Law of the Sea Conference, in which upwards of 150 nations participated, it now appears that the United States is going to scuttle the several years' work of this conference. Will Canada continue to issue permits for foreign nations to operate and fish within the 200-mile zone? I am not referring to the 12-mile limit.

If the answer is not forthcoming at this time, I would like to have it at a later date.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION—MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have a question about an international body of long standing and of great repute, namely, the International Joint Commission, which is often viewed as a model for such bodies by students of international bureaucracy. This commission is at present in a state of inactivity because the three American commissioners have resigned, and in a situation unusual in the United States, have not been replaced. Canada has only one commissioner.

I am now asking the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he can give us the assurance that the Government of Canada will demonstrate its appraisal of the importance of this body by immediately, or quickly, bringing our section up to strength, so that the important work of the International Joint Commission will not languish completely.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the dismissal of the three U.S. commissioners means that, unfortunately, the IJC has only one commissioner at the present time—a Canadian, Jean Roy, of Timmins, Ontario.

The government is in the process of selecting appropriate persons to fill the Canadian vacancies, which were caused by the resignation of the Canadian chairman, Stuart Hodgson, and the scheduled retirement of Commissioner Beaupré. We expect to announce those appointments shortly. We hope that the U.S. government will appoint new commissioners in the near future.

The commission completed a large number of outstanding tasks prior to the departure of the Canadian chairman. We are confident that the staff of the Canadian and U.S. sections will be able to operate effectively for a short time until new commissioners are appointed.

[Senator Roblin.]

ENERGY

OIL PRICING—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Minister of State for Economic Development a question with respect to the possibility of the resumption of active discussions between the federal government and the Province of Alberta on the question of an oil pricing regime for Canada.

Could the minister advise us as to whether those discussions can be expected to proceed in the next several days, and has the Government of Alberta now indicated its willingness to meet at the ministerial level to review pricing arrangements?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, when an indication is made to the federal government by the Government of Alberta, that indication will obviously be made known to the minister directly responsible, namely, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

I cannot say, at this time, that we have a positive indication of any specific date with regard to when those negotiations will resume. I can assure my honourable friend that the federal government regards the resumption and reasonably speedy resolution of the outstanding difference between the two governments as a very high priority.

ALBERTA

PROVINCIAL REFERENDUM BILL

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I wonder if the honourable minister could advise us as to whether the federal government has received any information or has any knowledge with regard to the purposes of the referendum bill now before and being proceeded with by the Alberta legislature. The information given in the press is that the provincial government is seeking authority to conduct a provincial referendum in the province of Alberta.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not know of any official or any other reason for this having been passed directly to the federal government; but I can make some inquiries and find out whether any indication has been made to any minister of the federal government as to the reason for proceeding with that bill at this time.

THE ESTIMATES

REDUCTION IN ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT ENVELOPE

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

The minister is no doubt aware that the recent estimates tabled by the government provide for a cut in the economic development envelope, for which he has responsibility, of $282 million, over what had been promised in the October budget—a cut which was the largest of any, in both absolute and proportionate terms. I am wondering as to what reason the minister can give for this lessening of priority with regard to economic development.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I think the Honourable Senator Charbonneau ought to check his figures. I do not believe that there is a cut of that magnitude. Indeed, there is an increase. Perhaps he is having the same problem as certain others, who are not adding up the same things. There is an over-all increase of 22 per cent, over and above a base budgeting, within the statements that have been made, and indeed, I think, to the extent that that is possible, this is also reflected in the estimates.

What happens between the estimates, of course, and the compilation of them, is that they can be somewhat at variance, because if the specific amounts assigned to particular programs have not been worked through—and there are one or two such programs, such as the industrial adjustment fund—then of course there will be some difference between what is in the so-called blue book of the estimates and what might have been announced in the budget.

Senator Charbonneau: As a supplementary, I see here in table 14, "Fiscal Plan by Envelope," on page 30, that economic development for 1980-81 was $5,883 million, and for 1981-82, $7,155 million. That is the budget. In the estimates it is $6,873 million.

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, I will be very happy to take those figures and refer them to the officials, who can give a very detailed, and, I am sure, a very clear and complete explanation of them.

PUBLIC SERVICE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question that I would like to address to the Minister of State for Economic Development. This also stems from the estimates.

Some time ago the Auditor General made a statement respecting the public service to the effect that it was operating only at 60 per cent efficiency. Last April the President of the Treasury Board undertook to take steps to reduce the size of the public service. I observe, however, that the main estimates provide for a net increase of 3,085 person-years during 1981-82.

My question is: Would the minister care to indicate to this house what provoked the government to break its commitment in this matter?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, that is an unfair question based on those factors. The government is not breaking its commitment. Obviously, there are some government services involving essential personnel, such as in the surveillance of our fishing waters. There are also certain such areas in law enforcement within the RCMP. We have stated all along that we are not going to hold man-years down to any level in those areas. I think the honourable senator needs a better explanation of what he is looking at.

● (1450)

Senator Donahoe: I have a supplementary question. I understand what the minister said in reply. Would the honourable senator agree that if the government has not broken its undertaking, then the President of the Treasury Board has broken his undertaking?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not accept that kind of accusation because it does not correspond with the facts. I suggest that the honourable senator examine the matter more closely. If he wishes to examine the matter on a global scale, he will find that since 1976 the totality—

Senator Flynn: Totality?

Senator Olson: —the size of the public service has grown at a rate which is substantially less than the rate of growth of the economy. What was important, even in the beginnings of the policy, and it has been repeatedly stated, is that some areas were considered exempt from the policy. I have identified a couple of areas, and there are more. The senator will find that the policy is in complete compliance with the government's stated intentions.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I do not wish to engage in a debate, but it appears to me that what the honourable senator has said is reminiscent of Mackenzie King's position on conscription which was "Conscription if necessary, but not necessarily conscription."

Am I to understand from the honourable senator's reply that when he says, "We will reduce the size of the public service", he means it will be reduced—unless he finds it convenient to go in the other direction and increase its size?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what is perfectly clear is that Senator Donahoe is giving an interpretation to my remarks which is simply not there. If he is incapable of understanding that there are essential government services which must expand as their requirement dictates—and I have stated the exceptions—then that is his problem. I have given the correct explanation. I suggest that the honourable senator take some time to make the calculations, or is he advocating that we not recruit people for law enforcement, fisheries surveillance and other essential services?

Senator Donahoe: The President of the Treasury Board does not understand that.

Senator Olson: If that is what the senator is advocating, that is certainly a change from the stance of his party.

GRAIN

STUDY BY CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am disappointed that the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board has seen fit to leave before we could get around to questioning him, but I am mollified by the fact that the Minister of State for Economic Development is here, because, as he displayed yesterday, he knows a thing or two about farmers, so I will try my questions on him to see what he has to say.

Is the minister aware of the fact that the Advisory Committee to the Canadian Wheat Board, I believe in the latter part of 1980, held a closed meeting to discuss the probability of the western Canadian agricultural wheat-producing area meeting the targets which were stipulated for the next five years? It has been proposed that we increase our production of grains from 20 million tonnes to 30 million tonnes.

As the study of this matter by the Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee was in camera, and since nobody seems to know what they found, is the minister prepared to make that study available to us?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I cannot give a direct commitment to make the study available. However, I will certainly convey the honourable senator's request to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board who, I presume, in turn, will ask that advisory committee whether or not they wish their findings to be made public or whether they are considered internal and for their own purposes. When I have a reply, I shall communicate it to my friend.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, to be sure, I anticipated a reply, but I can hardly believe that, as a matter of public policy on a matter as important as this to the farmers of western Canada, there can be any question of the facts being revealed to the people who, in my opinion, have a right to know. These findngs are particularly important to western farmers at the present time because a study prepared for the National Harbours Board and the Grains Group in Ottawa, released in the past few days, throws considerable cold water on the prospect that western Canadian agriculture will be able to meet these grain commitments in the stipulated five-year period.

It is a matter of some importance that the farmers learn what the advisory committee to the Wheat Board found so that it may be examined in conjunction with the report prepared for the Grains Group in Ottawa. While I am on my feet, I would appreciate receiving a copy of the report made to the Grains Group in Ottawa, so that the studies may be compared.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Roblin has said that he anticipated the reply and then went on to argue that the finding of the advisory committee ought to be public information. I believe I should repeat to him that what I was doing was indicating that we would not give an undertaking to make available the findings of a study which was made in camera, or internally, by any committee. As a matter of courtesy I made the proper comment that we would make a request. It may be that the committee is ready to make their findings public. Certainly, when a request is made, an explanation of when, where and so on will be forthcoming. It seems to me that within the dictates of courtesy I made the proper reply.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Roblin: I appreciate that courtesy is not a virtue to be despised.

Senator Olson: That's right.

Senator Roblin: However, we are dealing with a public body which must be responsible to somebody. It cannot hold private meetings concerning grain production in western Canada as the advisory committee to the Wheat Board, which in itself is an arm of the government. The government has a responsibility to produce this information. If it does not produce the information, then it should have a very good reason, because many farmers in western Canada are looking for answers.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am sure that the honourable senator knows the pitfalls of such an argument. One pitfall is that the members of the advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board are elected in their own right from within the various zones across western Canada. Certainly, they have the right to conduct their meetings or investigations in any way they choose. While the honourable senator may wish to ridicule my remarks on extending this committee the courtesy to make its own decision on what it wishes to do, I can tell him that I respect their right to receive a request as opposed to a demand.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I do not object to that, and my honourable friend can make as many requests as he elects. I am sure that that is an interesting way of obtaining the information. However, what I am interested in is results. If the honourable senator comes back to this chamber and tells me that he was unsuccessful in obtaining this information, he will hear more from me.

Senator Olson: I expect I will, but I did not expect the honourable senator to nail me with regard to the difference between "demand" and "request." I gave my interpretation of the situation. I want the honourable senator to understand that I have a great deal of respect for the ability of people to make decisions as to the way in which they conduct their business and as to whether they wish to make certain information public.

Senator Roblin: It will take a better man than me to nail my honourable friend, because he is about the slipperiest customer I have ever come across.

Senator Olson: Second to the slithering which goes on across the way.

POST OFFICE

EFFICIENCY OF MAIL SERVICE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Leader of the Government who, as an avid reader of the Vancouver Sun, will no doubt have seen the reports to the effect that some 50 per cent of the business of the United States post office in Blaine, Washington, comes from Canadians who are slipping across the border from his province, British Columbia, to use the relatively more efficient services of the U.S. postal department.

Would the minister indicate whether the government has any plans to improve the lamentable situation in our own Post Office and, in particular, whether he has considered consulting our colleague, Senator Denis, who was the last Liberal Postmaster General to succeed in getting the mail delivered on time?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is a long time ago.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I see that Senator Denis is leaving to mail a letter. Considerable effort is being made to improve the Post Office service in Canada. I have read the reports about the activities of some Canadians, who apparently see economies in driving to the United States to mail letters. One must question the economics of such safaris. Of course, the reports are of some concern, but there is no official statement from the office of the minister responsible for the Post Office.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, if I may I will recap the situation which we discussed earlier this afternoon. The Special Joint Committee on Official Languages will meet as scheduled on Tuesday morning at 9.30 in room 356-S; the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, Subcommittee on National Defence, will meet on Tuesday morning at 10.30 in room 256-S; the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will meet as scheduled at 1.30 in the afternoon in room 256-S. Senator Everett has agreed to conclude his meeting before 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Senator Barrow has agreed to delay the opening of his meeting from 2.30 to 3.30 in the afternoon, or at 4 o'clock, as the case may be, and will meet in room 356-S. Senator Hastings has agreed that the Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline, which was scheduled to meet in camera at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, will hold its meeting at 6 o'clock over dinner at a time and place to be announced.

The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science was scheduled to meet at 5 o'clock in the afternoon. The chairman is not here, but he is being informed of my suggestion. I can only suggest that that committee meet at 8.30 in the evening. I cannot determine whether the witness they have called is from Ottawa or from out-of-town. If acceptable, that would be the solution. If the chairman wishes to cancel the meeting altogether, it will be up to him to do so.

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture was scheduled to meet at 4.30 p.m. on Tuesday. The witnesses are public servants from Ottawa so we might, in view of the circumstances, depart from the established procedure and permit that committee to meet on Wednesday morning at 9 o'clock. The chairman may wish to postpone that meeting.

ENERGY

DOMESTIC OIL PRICE—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked on February 26 by Senator Roblin concerning a recent statement made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

(The answer follows:)

> I am informed that my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, was in Winnipeg on February 25 to address a group of senior DREE officials. I have seen a copy of Mr. Axworthy's speech and I can report to the honourable senators that the theme of his remarks was the challenges and opportunities facing western Canada today.
> Nowhere in the text of this statement did I see a reference to Alberta's "blackmailing" the rest of Canada. Quite the opposite, I believe that my colleague was encouraging a co-operative approach in which Canadians would work together in unity to build a strong future. This is the goal of our government.

I did obtain a copy of this speech, and instead of reading it into the record, I would be happy to give Senator Roblin a copy of it.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): If my honourable friend would give me a copy, and other senators do not object, that would suit me.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

VISIT TO CANADA—AGENDA ITEMS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a number of questions were raised yesterday with respect to the visit of the President of the United States to Canada, and I have some material now regarding the agenda items.

On the questions about Garrison and related matters of the environment, the President in his Address to Parliament, provided assurances that the United States "wants to continue to work co-operatively with us to understand and control air and water pollution." He also specifically undertook to continue joint "efforts begun with the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement of 1972 to protect our joint heritage in the Great Lakes."

Elsewhere, the President noted that negotiations with the aim of concluding a bilateral agreement on transboundary air pollution should begin in June, 1981, as envisaged in the August 1980 Memorandum of Intent.

With respect to the Garrison diversion project, in the talks with the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of Canada, the President expressed a firm assurance that the United States would not contribute to the pollution of Canadian waters in any such project.

With respect to the National Energy Program, the United States government naturally has some interest in it. What came out of the visit was an understanding that U.S. concerns can be adequately dealt with through ongoing discussions between officials. In short, the U.S. government does not have a political problem with the National Energy Program.

Secretary Haig, in commenting on the withdrawal of the recent critical U.S. communication on the National Energy Program, said: "It did not represent the opinion of myself or, I think, the administration." This is a very clear indication that the U.S. government is not challenging the National Energy Program. Understandably, the U.S. government wishes to ensure that in implementing the National Energy Program, Canada will honour its international obligations. It is the intention of the government to do so.

With respect to the Northern Gas Pipeline, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs told the house on March 10, the Reagan administration has now reaffirmed the assurances provided last summer by his predecessor, President Carter.

Secretary Edwards' letter states:

> The U.S. Government is firmly committed to the completion of the Alaska Gas Pipeline in conformity with agreements between our countries.

President Reagan said:

> We strongly favour prompt completion of this project based on private financing.

Secretary Haig made this remark:

> We are going to do all within our power to see that private financing is available. We are going to seek as soon as possible the completion of the U.S. segment . . . through (private financing.) And that's a reassurance and a restatement of our earlier assurances in this area.

The project has from the beginning been conceived as a privately financed undertaking. It was on this basis that the two governments approved the Northwest Foothills proposal. President Carter's assurances were on this basis. For any U.S. official even to suggest a willingness to consider government financing, would remove the pressure on the companies to arrange private financing. It would clearly be irresponsible for the Canadian government to expect this of the Reagan administration.

A private financing plan is expected to emerge in the next few months. At the March 10 press conference Secretary Haig refused to prejudge that plan or the U.S. government's reaction to it. This does not indicate a weakened U.S. commitment, but it simply recognized that the details of how the United States segment will be financed have yet to be finalized.

VISIT TO CANADA—STATEMENT TO PRESS BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a transcript of a statement given yesterday by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister at the conclusion of the visit of President Reagan and Mrs. Reagan. If honourable senators feel there is any value in it, I would be pleased to ask that it be incorporated in the record of today's proceedings. It touches on other matters which were discussed in those talks between the President and the Right Honourable the Prime Minister.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The statement follows:)

> Ladies and gentlemen of the press; the point has been made many times that we are happy to have received President Reagan and his ministers and officials.
>
> We want to report briefly this morning on the conversations and discussions which took place between us. I would merely preface them by saying that at the beginning of a new administration, we were surprised and delighted that so much ground could be covered in such a positive way.
>
> There is no subject and no grievance, if I could use the word, which the United States was not prepared to discuss and indicate a will to settle.
>
> We discussed yesterday morning mainly the area of international affairs, and we had a very wide-ranging 'tour d'horizon'. We talked of Afghanistan, Poland and the Middle East. We talked a fair amount of the Caribbean and Central America, and on El Salvador in particular there was agreement, as I could sense it, that the solution there should be a political solution and that we would work in whatever way we could to ensure that the moderates were those who took over and not the extremists of the right or of the left.
> We, as you know, reached an agreement on NORAD which will be signed imminently. We have reached an agreement on social security also; much of the work in these two areas had been done before we even sat down to talk because you realize, as we do, that every day of the week there are contacts between officials of both governments on a multitude of subjects, and what we concentrated on in our brief meetings was mainly in the area of disagreement or a need to clarify our respective positions. And I would say that on the two main areas of bilateral concern, we were very pleased with the ultimate response of the President of the United States.
>
> It began, of course, with an expression of our deep disappointment at the fact that the fisheries treaty had been withdrawn by the United States from ratification because from the outset we had argued, when these discussions began several years ago, that linkage between the boundaries settlement and the fisheries was not only necessary but it was obvious from the very nature of the two agreements. And we are disappointed at the delinkage, and that has been expressed very clearly to the United States. As I said in the House of Commons a few days ago, I think it is fair to put the best possible light on this and that is certainly in keeping with the attitude that the discussions assumed.
> The fisheries treaty was bogged down for a couple of years in the Senate and we view the United States gesture withdrawing that treaty as an indication of the determination to solve the problem in other ways because we made it quite clear that the two problems have to be solved, it is not just a matter of having the Courts determine the boundaries, it is a matter of making sure that though there will be no fish war, we gave each other the assurance of that, and we will take measures to make sure it does not happen.

No one would benefit if the fish ultimately were fished out by the extraordinary capacities of the Canadian fishermen to go ahead and fish if they see that there are no limits and that the Americans are not respecting them. So, in this sense, we are very happy that the United States administration has undertaken to assure fish conservation measures in that area and we are hopeful that the problem will be settled in that way. Indeed, we are more than hopeful, we are confident that it will.

The other area, of course, of great concern to Canada was cross-boundary pollution either through acid rain, Great Lakes water pollution or the particular case of the Garrison diversion, and on all these matters, I think it is fair to say that the United States, as the President had occasion to repeat in the House of Commons a few moments ago, we have the assurances that the United States has the will and the determination to co-operate with us in preserving the environment for ourselves and for posterity.

We talked about the pipeline, the Northern Gas Pipeline, and you have heard the President of the United States give us the assurance that they were determined to see it to its successful completion and, therefore, to carry out the undertakings we had had from the previous administration.

We talked about many other bilateral subjects in the area of trade. We said that the Auto Pact discussions should be pursued and continued. In the area of mass transit transportation, the United States has agreed to consider ways in which agreement and the buy-America provisions can be made to operate in a fair way to Canada.

We discussed other economic subjects, but I think it is important, in conclusion, to remind you that the impression that I got from our discussions with the American President and ministers was that we were doing this in the best possible of spirits and attitudes. We did not approach this as a zero sum game. We think that there can be beneficiaries on both sides in all these areas whether it be from the environment or trade. We do not see these negotiations as terminating in a victory for one and some losses for the other. On the contrary, the spirit and reality of these discussions and, I am convinced, of the future of our relations with President Reagan and his administration will be that both sides can come out the gainers if we solve problems of the environment, problems of boundaries or of fisheries, problems of trade, problems of social security, and that both sides have it to their advantage to look at international problems in that same light too because we share the main objectives of liberty and justice.

I expressed, for my part, that there might be some future meetings between the President of the United States, the President of Mexico and the Prime Minister of Canada, if we could have such meetings to try and share common views of people who inhabit the world, particularly as we regard international developments. We will be meeting again, the President and I and the other summiteers in July, and I think that we have shown, at least by our meeting in this past day and a half, that we intend to continue our consultations. I did make the point, and I think the President agreed, that our reaction to tensions in Poland, as different from our reaction to events in Afghanistan more than a year ago, showed that we had learned from the lesson of Afghanistan and that we understood that one of the most important things we could achieve, as like-minded countries, was to consult in order that we not react in disarray to crises or possible tensions in other parts of the world but that we act, in fact, as we are in spirit, with unison and with dedication to the spirit of freedom.

That is about all I think that I have to say, Mr. President, and it is up to you now to try and satisfy those who were not satisfied by me!

TRANSPORT

AIRLINES—SALE OF NORDAIR

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked on March 2 by Senator Asselin. His question was: When will the government cease trying to encourage a merger between the Lizotte group and Regionair? His second question was: Will a decision be made shortly and when will it be made?

The Minister of Transport has stated several times in the past, most recently in the house on February 17, 1981, that he is prepared to have Nordair sold to Regionair, a grouping of investors from Quebec and Ontario, provided certain conditions are met. To date these conditions have not been met and, accordingly, a sale has not been announced. In the circumstances, whether and when these conditions are met and a sale can proceed is difficult to say, but some progress has been made with the passage of time.

As previously explained by the minister, Regionair is a holding company created by prospective investors from Quebec and Ontario, which could purchase Nordair and Quebecair, and perhaps Great Lakes Airlines, with the purpose of eventually integrating regional air carrier services in Ontario and Quebec. The conditions the minister has imposed on any sale to Regionair include a balanced ownership distribution between the prospective investors from Quebec and Ontario, and a reconciliation of employee interests, management interests, particularly that of Nordair, and union interests.

It should be clear from the foregoing that the minister is not encouraging a merger between the Lizotte group and Regionair.

However, the minister recognizes the important contribution that Mr. Lizotte and the existing management at Nordair, as well as the employees, could make to a successful and harmonious integration of the management and unions of both Nordair and Quebecair.

OIL COMPANY PRICING PRACTICES—INQUIRY BY RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES COMMISSION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yesterday, Wednesday, March 11, Senator Flynn asked a supplementary question regarding the oil company pricing practices inquiry.

Section 13 of the Combines Investigation Act provides that the Director of Investigation and Research may apply to the Attorney General of Canada to appoint and instruct counsel to assist in an inquiry. As I have already indicated, that is what occurred in relation to the petroleum inquiry.

Honourable Senator Flynn, with his extensive background in that area, knows the nature of legal advice given in such circumstances has always been considered to be confidential and is treated as such.

BORROWING AUTHORITY

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and consider the subject-matter of the Bill C-59, intituled: "An Act to provide supplementary borrowing authority", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA STUDENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Daniel Riley moved the second reading of Bill C-55, to amend the Canada Student Loans Act.

He said: Honourable senators, in explaining the principle of this bill I will try to be brief. In 1979 a federal-provincial task force on student assistance was set up. It reported on December 2, 1980. The report was tabled on January 27, 1981, being a major report on financial assistance to Canadian post-secondary students, and was released jointly by Lynn Verge, President of the Council of Ministers of Education, Canada, and Francis Fox, Secretary of State and Minister of Communications. That task force, composed of federal and provincial officials, was asked to formulate alternatives for the consideration of ministers of the federal and provincial governments for the continuation, modification or replacement of existing policies and programs of federal and provincial government assistance to financially needy Canadian post-secondary students.

The report reflects the task force's activities in a number of key areas: a review of past studies in the area of student assistance, both in Canada and elsewhere; an analysis of existing student aid programs in Canada; and the consideration of the potential future trends that might bear on student aid in the 1980s. In addition, the task force brought together detailed statistical information on the operation of existing federal and provincial student aid programs.

The task force received some 300 submissions from interested organizations and individuals, and conducted three special surveys—one of the general student population; a second of graduates of post-secondary programs; and a third of financial aid for students in colleges and post-secondary institutions.

At the request of student organizations and the Council of Ministers of Education, Canada, and of the Secretary of State, they agreed that adequate opportunity should be given to students, student groups and the public generally to provide input into the report. Accordingly, comments are invited by June 1, 1981. The two levels of government have agreed that the task force will be asked to receive this public input and present analysis for ministerial consideration by December 1981.

A number of briefs have been presented and some oral representations have been made by student organizations across Canada, by universities and by other interested parties. In the meantime, however, before the task force assesses and reports on these briefs and makes its recommendations to the federal government, it has been considered necessary to introduce some interim amendments to the statute. Those interim amendments are contained in Bill C-55.

With the consent of all parties, Bill C-55 was passed in the other place on February 6 without being referred to committee, for the reason that there is considerable urgency surrounding the printing of material which will be necessary if the bill is passed. To put it another way, honourable senators, you will appreciate that should this bill be approved, it will be necessary to print and issue with dispatch new brochures to all concerned, together with the necessary modified application forms. If the measures are to take effect during the 1981-82 school year—and I know that honourable senators are interested in seeing that they do come into effect as soon as possible—the necessary materials will have to be in the hands of students prior to the end of the current academic year, which is the spring of 1981. To accomplish that will require a lot of printing and preparation of brochures, which must be in the hands of the students in order that they can make their applications early in the spring.

That is the main reason for our asking members of the Senate on both sides of the house for their co-operation in seeing that the bill is passed as soon as possible.

The bill is rather important for Canadian students. Those who will benefit most from this measure are the students of this country. I think it is commendable that the members on all sides of the House of Commons expedited the passage of this bill on February 6 in order to meet the deadlines necessary for the printing and preparation of the brochures and application forms.

As I have said, Bill C-55 proposes amendments to the Canada Student Loans Act. That act, as honourable senators know, enables full-time post-secondary students in financial need to obtain loans to assist them to meet their educational costs when they would otherwise be unable to pursue their personal educational goals.

● (1520)

The amount of loan assistance granted to an individual is determined by provincial authorities in accordance with minimum criteria agreed to by all participating provincial governments and, of course, the federal government.

The loans are advanced by chartered banks or other designated lenders such as credit unions. The Canadian government pays the interest charges on the loans while the students are enrolled in university or in community colleges and for a six-month period thereafter. These loans are guaranteed to the lenders against any loss under the program.

The act, introduced in 1964, was amended only once, and that was in 1970, although changes in loan limits have been effected twice by means of appropriation items, the most recent in 1975.

This program, of course, applies throughout Canada, but the Province of Quebec has opted out which means that, while this legislation does not apply to individual students in Quebec, the amounts will be transferred to the Quebec government to finance student-assistance programs.

This year, almost $21 million will be transferred to the Quebec government under the program. Since the program was implemented in 1964, over $126 million has been transferred to the Quebec government to be made available to Canadian students who are residents of Quebec.

Even although we are all preoccupied with the overwhelmingly important issue of constitutional reform, this bill is an essential piece of business since it will afford approximately 6,000 students per year across Canada access to student loans to continue their education, which, in many cases, they would otherwise be unable to have.

One of the most important amendments proposed in this bill arises from the need to accommodate the increase in the number of courses which are less than the traditional 26 weeks in length, now available to young people as the result of the rapid growth in the number of community colleges and technical and educational institutes at the post-secondary level. The main effect of this bill is that students in community colleges will qualify for aid under the Canada Student Loans Act.

Again I would stress that this bill is a temporary measure and awaits the recommendations of the task force after it has heard the briefs and recommendations of the various interested bodies and individuals.

The bill also provides for increased loans to students enrolled in courses of a longer duration than the traditional university academic year of 32 weeks, thus making it more practical for such students to continue their education without undue financial hardship.

As honourable senators know, the current legislation provides for maximum loans of $1,800 in an academic year of 26 weeks' duration. The bill before us proposes instead that loans be available to persons engaged in periods of study of at least 12 weeks' duration. The amendment takes into consideration changes which have occurred in Canadian educational patterns since the initial bill was introduced.

The bill also proposes that the loan limit of $1,800 be expressed on a weekly basis, thus relating the maximum amount of loan aid that a student may receive to the length of his or her course and, therefore, to the costs. The proposed weekly loan limit of $56.25 amounts to $1,800 over a 32-week course—the length of the traditional university course in which the majority of students are enrolled.

Since the current legislation entitles students enrolled in 26- to 31-week courses, and in semesters of 13 to 15 weeks that form part of a longer course, to $1,800 and $900 respectively, we are providing, in the bill, that such student remain eligible for loans up to these limits rather than the lesser amount of $56.25 weekly. This is particularly important in certain cases, notably that of Memorial University in Newfoundland.

Some provinces have suggested that the maximum loan limit should be raised substantially to provide more aid to needy students. However, at the same time, student groups, generally, have indicated strong opposition to any substantial increase in loan limits, insisting that loans should be replaced by non-repayable grants as are made in one or two provinces.

As I said, a federal-provincial task force on student assistance was set up in 1980. The report of that task force was received by the Minister of Education and by the federal government on January 27, 1981, and is available in both official languages for anyone who is interested in reading it. The report includes a review of past studies in the area of student assistance, both in Canada and elsewhere. It includes an analysis of existing student aid programs in Canada; the potential future trends of student aid in the 1980s; the principles and objectives which should govern student aid; and gives program alternatives compatible with principles and objectives.

It is expected that when this report is made to the federal government it will result in much more far-reaching legislation which I hope will be more beneficial to students than these stopgap amendments.

The bill, while important, does not propose sweeping changes in the program at the moment, changes that we believe are essential to update the act in light of changing course patterns. Therefore, it will not pre-empt any decisions which may flow from the work of the task force in the form of future legislation.

In addition to the important modifications that have been suggested and which I have mentioned already, the bill proposes several amendments of a housekeeping nature. It proposes the current requirement for a 12-month waiting period before an application may be accepted for those with permanent resident status. As honourable senators know, the Immigration Act of 1977 no longer permits a student to convert student visa status to permanent resident status while in Canada; hence, the waiting period is no longer relevant and it has been removed. I am sure this modification will be welcomed by many students in this country who are visiting from another country.

The bill also proposes the inclusion of specific authority for the Governor in Council to make regulations respecting the denial of further assistance to those deliberately abusing the program. It also includes authorization for the Governor in Council to make regulations restricting payments to banks under the guarantees where the bank has failed, without cause, to submit claims for loss promptly, thus avoiding unnecessary accumulation of interest charges against the student borrower.

The bill also provides for a change in the minister responsible, consequent upon the transfer of the program from the Department of Finance to the Secretary of State.

I do not think I should go into this matter any further at the present time. Because of the necessity for having all of these forms and brochures in the hands of the students within the next couple of months, I would urge honourable senators to give ready support to this bill. I am sure they will gain the appreciation of all students across Canada.

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Before the debate is adjourned I should like to make a few comments. I do not want to participate, at any length, in the debate, but I would thank Senator Riley for his excellent introduction of Bill C-55 and indicate my general support for it.

However, I want to draw to his attention the concern expressed by myself and other members of this chamber a few years ago when reports came through of unpaid accounts under the Canada Student Loans Act. A Toronto newspaper—I believe it was the Toronto Star—studied this particular aspect of this very worthwhile program. The results were almost horrendous regarding the amount of money that was not paid back by students who were successful in graduating from various universities. In some instances they were earning high incomes, but were literally snapping their fingers at the government and saying there was no way they would pay. To me, that seemed to be a thankless situation for a government that had made available those funds for needy students, and found, after the students had received their education, that they literally refused to pay their bills, or meet their legitimate obligations to repay, in due course, the amount that had been forwarded to them.

● (1530)

So I say to Senator Riley that when the bill goes to committee—and I am not sure which committee it will be—adequate information will be made available on the bad debt experience of the Canada Student Loans Act; on what collection procedures are being followed; whether, in fact, we can see a change in the responsibility of students toward their obligation; whether there is adequate collection machinery available to ensure that these worthy loans are recognized as such by those who receive them; and whether repayment is made whenever possible.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, in moving the adjournment of the debate, may I say that I am glad that Honourable Senator Buckwold has made his comments. In preparing my own comments on this bill, I will take note of what he has said, and, of course, the comments of the sponsor of the bill.

On motion of Senator Bélisle, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development) moved the second reading of Bill C-60, to amend the National Energy Board Act.

He said: Honourable senators, in introducing Bill C-60, I should point out that it is essentially the same as Bill S-12 which passed through its three stages in this chamber about two years ago.

It is extremely important for honourable senators, and particularly those members of the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline who at that time were involved in the examination of expropriation law, to recall that what became clear very early in those hearings was the fact that there was a serious deficiency in the National Energy Board with respect to expropriation procedures under the National Energy Board Act.

At that time the committee did a detailed analysis of the provisions of the National Energy Board Act. In connection with expropriation procedures there was reference only to the old Railway Act. Quite probably that was not appropriate even then, but I am not being critical of the situation or of the people involved at that time. In 1959, when the National Energy Board was set up, there was a need to have some basis for rules respecting expropriation whenever a strip of land was required and it could not be acquired by negotiation. It was not done at that time, and it has not been done since, until the committee discovered this injustice. It discovered many places where, for example, the Law Reform Commission had commented on landowners' rights under the law, and said, for example, that the landowners' position was untenable. There were many such references.

Therefore, it is appropriate, for those honourable senators who did a good deal of work on that committee, to recognize that the present bill is now reaching fruition. It has now passed all stages in the other place; it is now being considered in the Senate on second and third reading; and, following Royal Assent, it will become law.

In preparing Bill S-12—which, as I have said, is essentially the same as Bill C-60—a great deal of assistance was given by members of the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline. I will not take the time now to thank each one individually. As I look around this chamber, on both sides of the house, I recall that a great deal of skill and understanding were brought to the consideration of that committee, and I again thank the members for the work they did over a period of more than a year in putting that bill together.

At that time we heard testimony from representatives of farm organizations, and many of the pipeline companies were helpful in assisting the committee. Unfortunately, the bill was not passed by the other place before dissolution of Parliament in 1979, and so it is now back with us.

I should like to make one point about that. When it was sent to the other place after passage in the Senate, the then Speaker took under advisement the question of whether or not it was in order to pass a bill which might contain provisions which exceeded the authority of the Senate with respect to expenditures out of the public treasury. The Speaker of the Senate did not make a decision or give a view on that matter. However, in the present situation, the bill was introduced in the other place by a member of the Treasury benches and was preceded by a resolution. So all of the former difficulties have been resolved by the bill proceeding via that route.

There are, however, some differences in the bill before us. A number of them relate to the fact that it is now a government sponsored bill going through the proper channels, and therefore we do not have to be quite as careful about whether there is any charge on the public treasury. Indeed, there are, I believe, two or three instances where the government or the National Energy Board will be paying some of the expenses—such as, for example, those of the arbitration committee and other administrative officers. Therefore the provisions, as designed in Bill S-12, were to try to ensure that all of those costs would be assigned to the companies involved because of the limitation I have just expressed.

Quite frankly, I believe that most honourable senators will agree with me that some of those public administrative requirements, such as the appointment of members of an arbitration committee and other officers who obviously will be needed to administer the bill—there are not many, but there are a few—represent legitimate public expenses. Therefore, I believe it is probably a better bill from that point of view.

Honourable senators will realize that Bill C-60 has very wide support in Parliament. As a matter of fact, it passed through its second and third reading stages in the other place last Friday without being referred to the appropriate House of Commons committee. I think that is an indication that it was well drafted, and that the members of both parties in the opposition in the other place had looked it over and found it to be a highly desirable bill.

I would like to put on the record, as briefly as I can, an outline of the highlights of this bill, because it does not seem fair that those who read Hansard, and who wish to make reference to the bill, should have to refer to the committee reports that were printed two years ago.

The first highlight of the bill concerns the approval of the pipeline route, which means that landowners along that route will be notified by the companies of their intention to apply to the National Energy Board for approval of the detailed route, and the landowner may file a written objection. If any objections are received, the board must hold public hearings in the area. The board, under this bill, may alter the route, the timing or, indeed, the method of land acquisition, based on the objections that may be raised at the public hearings.

The second highlight of the bill is with regard to compensation. The landowner will have a choice of a lump sum payment or periodic payments, which would be subject to review at five-year intervals. The company must serve the landowner with notice of compensation to be paid, and must describe the procedures available to him under the act for his protection, including his right to object. Honourable senators know, of course, that that was not provided in the old Railway Act in such detail. In fact, I think it is fair to say that there were no guidelines at all contained in the old Railway Act as to the basis on which the company would be offering compensation to the landowner.

The third highlight of the bill concerns the handling of disputes. When the landowner and the company fail to reach an agreement by negotiation, either party may apply to the minister—in this case, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—to appoint a negotiator. This, of course, precedes any arbitration decisions with respect to expropriation, so that there is an attempt to negotiate the differences between the landowner and the company. If negotiation fails, either party may ask the minister to refer the question to an arbitration committee for a binding decision. You will understand that at the negotiation stage the decision is not binding, but it is at the arbitration committee stage. The pipeline company will pay all reasonable costs of these arbitration proceedings. The company may acquire land without the landowner's consent, but with National Energy Board approval. However, the landowner must be advised 30 days before the company applies to the National Energy Board, and is entitled to submit a written objection. When the company receives the right of entry, the landowner may receive an advance on the compensation which will be paid to him.

As many of you know, there has been some criticism in the other place to the effect that the construction of the Alaska Highway gas pipeline was allowed to begin before this new legislation on land acquisition was passed. I wish to advise honourable senators that I sought and indeed have received a personal assurance from the Foothills group that, if such a bill were passed at any time during the course of the project, the company responsible for this pipeline would make the necessary adjustments to reflect the new approach with respect to compensation as provided under Bill C-60. Of course, the most important point in that respect is the landowner's right to an annual payment of compensation for the use of his land.

Our colleague, Senator Hastings, is now the chairman of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, which, as you know, took the initiative some weeks ago to circulate Bill C-60 to interested parties and to ask for their comments on it. At that time, Senator Hastings did not know when the bill would reach us here. However, he also sought and received approval from this house to have the subject matter of Bill C-60 referred to the committee. I want to commend Senator Hastings for his initiative, and hope that his committee will now proceed to hear the testimony from the parties who expressed an interest in the hearings.

It may be well to conclude, honourable senators, by suggesting that the substance of this bill has undergone a very long and detailed examination by many interested parties across the country and quite a number of senators here. By and large, it is highly acceptable, not only to us but to farm organizations, a number of the pipeline companies and other interested parties. Therefore, I suggest that we send the bill to the committee as soon as possible, so that the witnesses can testify with the bill officially in front of them. If that is not possible, I suppose they could spend some time on the reference of the subject matter, but it seems to me that it would be better to have the bill officially before the committee when the witnesses are called.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Balfour, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, in October 1980, some five months ago, I spoke in this chamber with regard to the proposed resolution on the Constitution and the motion which established the parliamentary committee to study that resolution. At that time I expressed my concerns and my doubts about the course of action the government was taking and, indeed, about the contents of the resolution itself. In the course of this intervention I hope to make less comment on the content and to put more emphasis on the procedure that is being followed by the government at this time.

Before doing so, I should like to join all other members of this chamber in extending the congratulations and, indeed, the thanks of all Canadians to the members of the committee who performed well under what were, at times, very trying circumstances, and who did an outstanding job, having regard to the time constraint and other problems. I believe that in extending such a congratulatory note, one ought not to be bound to have accepted every conclusion reached by the majority of the committee.

I should also like to pay particular tribute to my own colleagues on this side of the chamber who formed the more permanent membership of the committee, and I now speak of Senators Roblin, Tremblay and Asselin. They did an outstanding job in very difficult circumstances and in the process demonstrated to so many Canadians the importance of the work of senators and, in particular, the effectiveness of the small but hard-working opposition in the Senate.

Last week we were treated to the intervention of Senator Thompson and, quite apart from the conclusion which the honourable senator reached and my own partisan view and acceptance of that conclusion, members on all sides of the house must certainly applaud the incredible research which must have been done in order to deliver that speech. Without repeating anything of what Senator Thompson has said, the central theme of his speech was to the effect that the means did not justify the end. Undoubtedly, in his view and the view of the authorities quoted by him, the entire procedure was, to say the least, faulty—if not against parliamentary convention—which, I assume, leads us to the conclusion that perhaps it is even illegal. I will have more to say about the legal aspect in a moment. Senator Thompson expressed his deep concern not so much, as I said, with the substance of the resolution, but rather with the unilateral action—the procedure being followed.

Senator Thompson concluded, no doubt on a legal basis but, more importantly, on the basis of parliamentary convention and the commitments and undertakings of past prime ministers, that the Constitution should not—indeed, could not be altered unilaterally, without the consent of the provinces. As one reads and re-reads the good senator's research, one finds a deep and moral obligation on the part of the federal government to proceed now, as it always has, with the consent of the provinces.

For various reasons, including the size and diversity of the country, our nation was established as a federation with two levels of government, each sovereign in its defined areas of jurisdiction. It is a matter of simple fact that such has been the case until today.

Initially, in the setting up of the federation the federal government was given jurisdiction over matters of mutual concern, and the provinces over matters of greatest concern to their people and their particular areas and communities. Under that system the country has grown and evolved, and in the view of many the system is still satisfactory today. The great distances, the great economic, social and cultural differences that exist among the various regions of Canada render it virtually impossible for a single, central government to reflect adequately the legitimate expectations and aspirations of people in all regions of the country.

We are therefore governed by two levels of government, as I say, each sovereign in its own area of jurisdiction. It is important for us all to understand that the powers of the provincial legislatures of Canada are not delegated powers. They cannot be altered or diminished or removed by the federal Parliament of Canada. There is ample authority, in law, for that view. The legal authorities go as far back as 1883, when the Privy Council determined that issue in what is known as the Hodge case, and I will touch on that a little later.

Pronouncements by such eminent Canadians as the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent, both when he was Prime Minister and Minister of Justice, and by a former Minister of Justice, the Honourable Guy Favreau, recognize as a general principle that the Canadian Parliament would not and could not affect provincial rights without prior consultation and agreement with the provinces.

One need not look much further back than December 1979, when the Supreme Court of Canada, in dealing with the Senate reference case, once more affirmed that the federal amending power extended only to the Constitution of Canada in its federal aspect. I am sure that most senators read the entire judgment, but a couple of lines are of particular significance:

> But Section 91(1) does not give power to amend the Act. Instead, the phrase 'Constitution of Canada' is used. In our opinion, the word 'Canada' as used in Section 91(1) does not refer to Canada as a geographical unit but refers to the juristic federal unit. 'Constitution of Canada' does not mean the whole of the British North America Act, 1867, but means the constitution of the federal government, as distinct from the provincial governments. The power of amendment conferred by section 91(1) is limited to matters of interest only to the federal government.

That, honourable senators, is the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada. I submit to you that it is therefore abundantly clear that that is the established practice in Canada.

Further, it is very clear that amendments have not been made to the Constitution without the consent of the provinces unless, of course, such amendments did not affect any particular province, or their interests or jurisdiction.

Honourable senators, it is admitted that the constitutional package now before us does affect the powers of the provinces. This has been admitted in the factum submitted by federal government counsel in the litigation heard in the Manitoba Court of Appeal.

That being so, the changes could only be made in accordance with what is now the established amending formula in this country. Although the Prime Minister attempts to argue otherwise, such a formula is in existence today. We may be unhappy with the situation, but the unanimous consent of the provinces and the Parliament of Canada is necessary before changes affecting both levels of government can be made.

Senator Frith: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Nurgitz: I prefer to finish first.

It would appear that the position being taken by the government is that there may well have been commitments by prime ministers, justice ministers and the like, but as I understand the position of Senator Lamontagne and the position taken by the Government of Canada in its appearance before the Manitoba Court of Appeal, those are not legal, binding commitments which prevent the government from proceeding with amendments.

As I read Senator Lamontagne and others who have argued as to the legality of proceeding as the federal government is now doing, I notice throughout those arguments a clear preference, perhaps even some government obligation, if not a legal one, for obtaining the consent of the provinces. Once more, those may well not be legal commitments, but if they are not binding they may at least be described as being moral commitments. In addressing this matter today I would like to make a distinction between a moral commitment and a legal one, and I take the position that both commitments are binding on the present government.

Honourable senators, if we accept the view of many senators opposite, we are in the midst of a constitutional crisis, the country is paralyzed, and now is not the time to be worrying about morals. That being the case, perhaps what we ought to examine is the legal position. What I do not understand is why this government is not referring this matter to the ultimate legal authority in this country, the Supreme Court of Canada. Why is there such reluctance to test the legality of this proposed major overhaul of the Constitution of this country?

Just yesterday, Senator Godfrey, speaking in favour of the resolution, though with reluctance, which I will not repeat, said, as reported at page 2007 of Debates of the Senate:

> As I said earlier, one of the matters that I very definitely disagree with is the apparent eagerness of the federal government to press the U.K. Parliament to deal with this resolution before the Supreme Court of Canada has a chance to adjudicate as to whether or not it is legal.

The Prime Minister, in the other place, and, indeed, the Minister of Justice from public platforms, have taken the view that this entire matter is a political one and not a legal one. Indeed, counsel for the Government of Canada attempted to persuade the Manitoba Court of Appeal of that position as well.

I would like to refer to a short passage in the majority judgment of the Chief Justice of Manitoba. He is referring to question two, which was as follows:

> Is there a constitutional convention that Parliament will not request the Imperial Parliament to amend the Constitution affecting federal-provincial relationships or powers without obtaining the agreement of the province?

The Chief Justice of Manitoba said, in the majority judgment:

> Counsel for the Attorney General of Canada submits that the question is essentially a political one and therefore should not be answered. Indeed he says it is, "purely political". In my view this submission goes too far. Its > characterization of question two as "purely political" overstates the case. That there is a political element embodied in the question, arising from the contents of the Joint Address, may well be the case. But that does not end the matter. If Question 2, even if in part political, possesses a constitutional feature it would legitimately call for our reply. In my view the request for a decision by this Court on whether there is a constitutional convention, in the circumstances described, that the Dominion will not act without the agreement of the provinces poses a question that is, at least part, constitutional in character. It therefore calls for an answer, and I propose to answer it.

Honourable senators, there is clearly a legal problem here, albeit constitutional in character. I submit to you that it is a problem which is presently before the Supreme Court of Canada, and why we cannot wait, before proceeding, to hear the ultimate legal authority in this country is difficult to understand. Perhaps there is a concern or worry on the part of the promoters of this exercise that the Imperial Parliament is not supreme or sovereign over Canada and is not bound by any conventions. Is there concern that a court may say that there are conventions that do have the force of law and which cannot be disregarded?

● (1600)

Are there not, among honourable senators, lawyers and parliamentarians who recognize that the Canadian Constitution is not entirely written—that is, that it consists of a written part and an unwritten part and that the unwritten part may well be very important? The unwritten part of the law consists of the customs, usages, principles, practices and conventions which have been recognized or are now recognized by all of the courts in this land as having the force of law.

For those of you who might consider the view that conventions are not legally binding, I refer you to the words of Viscount Haldane who, in 1923, said:

> One must remember in dealing with what is Dominion status, we are dealing with nothing which you can find any definition of in any law book—there cannot be—it is a question really of constitutional practice. By the strict legal theory of this Constitution of the Empire, the King is omnipotent; but there has grown up a restriction of a Constitutional kind through Parliaments and through the necessities of responsible representative governments, which strictly limits the power of the King; but you will not find a limitation by searching books; you will not find this laid down in the form of an abstract legal proposition of statute law or common law; they are just as real but they are constitutional limitations.

Surely, that is a commentary on the history that has evolved, not just in Canada but throughout the British Commonwealth. By the strict letter of the law perhaps the Queen can make her own laws of her own will. Although that would be a strict reading of the law, it is now an accepted principle, and universally recognized, that the Queen is restrained from making such laws. This is a constitutional practice in usage which is now universally accepted.

Could it be that the constitutional advisors to the government are deeply concerned that pronouncements by the courts over the years have maintained that each of the federal and provincial governments is sovereign within its own legislative boundaries? Could one of them have read the Supreme Court decision of Mr. Justice Dickson in the Amax Potash Limited case in 1977, when he said:

> The courts will not question the wisdom of enactments which, by the terms of the Canadian Constitution are within the competence of the legislatures, but it is the high duty of this Court to ensure that the legislatures do not transgress the limits of their Constitutional mandate and engage in the illegal exercise of power.

That judgment goes on to proclaim that it is the duty of the court not only to be certain that a province does not transgress its boundaries but also that the federal government does not act in violation of the Canadian constitution. Those interesting words by that particular Supreme Court judge indicate that the courts will not permit any legislature to do indirectly what it could not do directly or, to quote Mr. Justice Dickson again, "and by covert means to impose illegal burdens".

Honourable senators, if you accept the view, as I am sure you do, that Canada is a free, sovereign and completely independent country, then is there not some concern as to whether the Parliament at Westminster would even have the legal power to alter the fundamental structure of the federation without the consent of its constituent parts?

Honourable senators, until this current constitutional conflict emerged, most of you, either as lawyers or as persons engaged in the operation of government, I am sure, had had experience in dealing with constitutional matters, and particularly those very basic constitutional questions dealing with sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act. Is a certain piece of legislation within the legislative competence of the enacting body or is it beyond its powers—that is, ultra vires?

The courts are often asked to deal with the question of whether a certain statute is within or beyond the jurisdiction of the legislature that enacted it. A very simple example is in regard to the Criminal Code offence of driving while disqualified, which within the last three or four weeks was declared by the Supreme Court of Canada to be within the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces, not of the federal government. The Supreme Court determined that this Parliament could not enact a law which said that driving while disqualified is a criminal offence; that this is a matter which falls within provincial jurisdiction. Accordingly, that section of the Criminal Code was declared to be ultra vires. It is a very simple principle that legislators and lawyers have long understood.

Honourable senators, I have difficulty understanding how, based on the same principle, this Parliament can legislate matters affecting the rights of the provinces if it is not within our constitutional authority to do so. However, should we be getting into the argument of whether Senator Lamontagne is correct or whether Senator Thompson is correct? Surely, in this great nation of ours we have and accept the Supreme Court of Canada as the highest judicial authority.

Honourable senators, no less an authority than Professor Maxwell Cohen, one of the leading witnesses to appear before the committee, expressed agreement in principle with the general form of both the constitutional package and its entrenched Charter of Rights. I should mention, though, that very little of the original charter met with his approval. I believe that Professor Cohen had some 30 complaints with regard to the charter, but he expressed general agreement with the entire package.

Senator Roblin: No referendum?

Senator Nurgitz: No referendum.

Professor Cohen appears to take issue with the Kershaw report, and, indeed, attacks the legitimacy of the Kershaw committee to interpret the Canadian Constitution and the federal system. Professor Cohen went on to say:

> What the committee ignored was the established principle that the only proper forum for any binding interpretation of the Canadian federal system and its Constitution must be in Canada. This is true for obvious reasons, including Canada's general sovereign status, the 1931 Statute and the abolition of all appeals to the Privy Council. Hence, the only institution for the interpretation of the Canadian Constitution that has final and authoritative value for Canadians and Commonwealth as a whole remains the Supreme Court of Canada.
> It must be concluded therefore that there was no proper legal or political or, indeed, historical basis for any unilateral British political-legal interpretation of that part of the Canadian Constitution represented by section 7 of the Statute of Westminster. That section froze the status quo of 1931, since federal and provincial governments could not agree on an amending procedure affecting their legal powers and so left it for the British Parliament until a formula would emerge. As part of the Canadian constitutional system, the only place to interpret any segment of that system, including section 7, must be in Canada. The only authoritative interpretative source is the Supreme Court of Canada.

Honourable senators, I think it has already been pointed out by others that our honourable friends opposite are urging upon us a constitutional package which, in essence, says that the best protection that the citizens of this country can get for their rights is having those rights entrenched in a charter with the interpretation, the validity, or the obvious consequences of any of the sections of the charter to be pronounced and determined by the courts. These very same people, moving in what Senator Manning has called "indecent haste", are barreling along the road to have this matter passed, approved and sent to the Parliament at Westminster, before the Supreme Court—the institution that they say will be the guardian angel of our rights—has had an opportunity to rule on it. One marvels at the inconsistency.

Has anyone thought through the question of what the consequences would be to proceed and have the Imperial Parliament accede to the request of this Parliament and, after all of that, face the possibility of a Supreme Court ruling to the affect that all of it is illegal? Has anyone thought through the unscrambling of that egg?

Honourable senators, just last Tuesday I raised a question dealing with amendments to the Criminal Code of Canada, as it related to a prostitution problem in the city of Vancouver. On March 5, 1981, last Thursday, the Deputy Leader of the Government provided an answer, part of which was:

> Another aspect of the problem is the case on the subject that is at this moment before the Supreme Court. It is traditional for the Minister of Justice to wait until the final determination of a point of law has been made by the courts before he proposes amendments. When the Supreme Court has disposed of that case, we will advise Parliament about what steps, if any, the government proposes to take.

The deputy leader is my best authority.

If certain ladies of the night in Vancouver can have their fate determined by the Supreme Court of Canada, why cannot the government extend the same principle to a matter which is fundamental to all Canadians? Honourable senators, we in this chamber know in our hearts that the contents of the resolution are fundamental to the extent that they will alter forever our very system of government. That point, I believe, is beginning to be understood by Canadians in every part of the land. Citizens everywhere are expressing unease with the government's course of action. Their concerns, I submit, are genuine.

● (1610)

I add my voice to the eloquent appeals made by my colleagues, by members in the other place and by scores of our concerned citizens: Until the Supreme Court renders judgment, the government has not the full legal authority to command our support. Even beyond the legal matter, we must address the grave moral and political implications that now confront our country.

Honourable senators, I am left with no choice, as Canadians are left with no choice, but to oppose the resolution with all my strength.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, may I begin by commending Senator Nurgitz for a very thoughtful and scholarly address? I certainly can call him my learned confrère. I am particularly impressed with the original and personal research which has obviously been conducted by him. I should also like to say, at the beginning, that the quality of his speech and of the other speeches made in this chamber on this resolution has been of an extremely high order. I congratulate all of the participants in this debate on the care and attention they have given to so serious a matter. Also, I thank Senator Nurgitz for the line he took at the beginning, which I think is a most impressive one. It greatly assists me in developing a single point out of all of these issues, which I propose to do.

Before proceeding further, I should like to say a few things about the committee itself. I was appointed an original member of the committee, and was reasonably faithful in my attendance from the early part of November. For all the meetings that I was not able to attend, I was so interested in what they were doing that I was glued to the television. I had not been a member of a joint committee since 1956. I found the meetings to be somewhat strange after the free and easy way we operate in committees of the Senate. The rules of the House of Commons applied. There were timed interventions, by party. There was a tendency to make political speeches. But, on the whole, I must commend the members of the committee for the fact that while much of the discussion was political, there was no personal invective of any consequence. That is a great tribute to the members of the committee. They tried, and I think they succeeded in, sticking to the subject matter that was before them.

The little red eye of the television cameras commanded the attention of many of the members of the House of Commons, more than it did the senators', although Senators Roblin, Tremblay, Lucier and most certainly Senator Austin were very conscious of the little red eye, and did very well in front of it. Not only do I say that because of their performance which I witnessed in the committee room itself. I watched them carefully on television when I was not in committee, and they were equally good then.

I must commend the members of the committee, too, not only for the very thorough way in which they examined the witnesses—and there were many—but also for the way in which they handled the clause-by-clause discussion. It was a thorough process, and it was tiring.

One thing I think people do not recognize in connection with the work of a committee of this kind is the importance of having good research. The group I want to commend and congratulate on their research is the staff which looked after the two opposition parties. I thought this was a piece of work of very high calibre. The material committee members and others had supplied to them by these people could not have been better. I realize how difficult it is for those in the opposition to deal with this problem. Unlike members of the government party, they do not have the facilities, if, indeed, they have any of the facilities, of the departments concerned. That applies not only to the briefs that came in, but also to the evidence, to the precedents, to the cases, and to the references to the evidence that were made available to members of the committee. I wish we could have had something equally as good on the government side. We could not, because one cannot look for political help from public servants. There were political arguments and stances developed on the government side, but they were developed on a free-wheeling basis. Perhaps that is good enough.

May I commend the joint chairmen? I believe Serge Joyal and Senator Hays complemented each other extremely well. They ran a good and thorough show. They were there constantly, and were alert to everything that happened. I thank, too, the senators, other than the senators who were originally appointed to the committee, for the help they gave the members. Personally, I think we owe a particular debt of gratitude in this house to the lady senators who helped the regular members of the committee. They showed great devotion and a great sense of responsibility.

I believe it will not be taken amiss, and as a political statement, if I say that I thought the outstanding performance was given by Mr. Chrétien, the Minister of Justice. He spent weeks before the committee, both at the beginning of the hearings and as the committee wound up its proceedings. He dealt with the clause-by-clause study. He showed that he was familiar with the details as well as with the larger issues involved. He showed great patience. Perhaps also as a result of the work he did with the attorneys general of the provinces during the summer, he has qualified himself as a great constitutional expert. Apart from party, I think the Parliament of Canada should be most grateful to him for his work before the committee.

Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words about the charter. The Charter of Human Rights is not new to Parliament. Mr. Diefenbaker had a Bill of Rights which passed this Parliament many years ago. Parliament has been involved and has discussed the United Nations Declaration on Human Rights. We had Bill C-60 two or three years ago. We have had provincial Bills of Rights with which many of our members are familiar. We have a Canadian Human Rights Commission. We have Human Rights Commissions in many, if not all, of the provinces.

Last summer we heard of the meetings on the charter between the Minister of Justice and the attorneys general. We saw on television the discussion of the charter at the First Ministers' Conference. We had three months of meetings in the committee which involved a great deal of discussion on the charter. The evidence given on the charter was of a high quality. We heard from experts; we heard testimony given at times with emotion; but the views of the country expressed there were fully representative, I believe, of virtually every point of view, and I feel the weight of the evidence was strongly in favour of having a charter, and having it now.

All political parties represented on the committee participated fully, and not only in the process but in the results, too, because the charter has been improved and extended.

Honourable senators, the proposal to postpone dealing with the charter until patriation certainly does not commend itself to me, because if it were to be dealt with after patriation, with the amending formulae and procedures prescribed by the resolution, it might well be that those rights would not be put into the Constitution for as much as five years or longer, and there are a good many people anxious to see a charter in this country who would consider that far too great a delay.

The rights proposed in the charter are, as we know, general rights. They are rights to which, I think it is commonly agreed, all Canadians are entitled. They are rights which Parliament, with its broad powers on national matters, should legitimately decree in a constitution. It should not be the privilege of any province to deny those rights to any group by some opting-out option or by invoking the power to legislate on local or private or provincial matters. Especially do I make that statement in the face of the officially bilingual status of our society.

When Parliament alone petitioned the British Parliament, or His Majesty, for the admission of the western territoires as provinces, it did so without consulting the existing provinces, and yet their future status was undoubtedly affected by that step. But that step, as is the case with the charter, was acknowledged to be another step towards the goal of national fulfilment. I think it is in the context of attaining that goal, or at least of taking a giant step towards attaining it, that we can support strongly the proposal to include the charter in this resolution.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Connolly: Honourable senators, I want now to talk about a legalistic matter of great consequence which arises out of the discussions held in connection with the resolution. It may be that Senator Nurgitz will feel that I am repeating what he said. I begin by saying that every independent country worthy of the name should control its own destiny. To do that it becomes imperative for it to control its basic law, its constitution, and to control it completely. From its constitution flow the principles that establish a country's government, its society, its economy, and its external relations. Therefore, it alone can determine the appropriate extent of constitutional change needed to meet its own emerging circumstances.

Pride in its independence is a compelling factor in a country's desire to control its own constitution. But, more than that, the practical needs of the nation may be still more compelling.

At the Imperial Conference in 1926 there were three men who really were behind the issue of the Balfour Declaration. Of those three, two were rebels and one was the grandson of a rebel. I refer to De Valera from Ireland, Smuts from South Africa, and King of Canada. The declaration that was made on that occasion, as all honourable senators know, provided that the six dominions and the United Kingdom, all of them, would be autonomous communities within the Commonwealth, equal in status and in no way subordinate one to another. In 1931 the Statute of Westminster confirmed that. The Colonial Laws Validity Act was deemed no longer to apply to the six dominions; but, at Canada's request, the ability to amend the British North America Act remained in London. That was the only caveat on our independence. After that, the times in Canada were heady. Canadians basked in their newly-acknowledged status of independence. But the caveat remained. Both federal and provincial authorities failed to find an amending formula in three successive federal-provincial meetings, in 1927, 1931 and 1935. Then war broke out.

After the war, Canadian development was spectacular. There was immense growth in population, in primary and secondary industry in this country, in capital formation and in the growth of the GNP. The shape of Canada as a country changed both dramatically and swiftly. But if the stature of Canada, both at home and abroad, had moved to new heights, there was a corresponding growth in the stature of many of the provinces as well. Emerging new national policies and priorities had a profound effect upon the provinces. Federal-provincial conferences became a more important forum for them to clarify economic, social and political policies that were to apply in the country.

The provinces quite rightly sought more input. Over the years federal-provincial agreements were made in such areas as the rental of tax fields, equalization payments, higher education, and social programs. The provinces were spending more and more of their own money and an increasing percentage of the federal revenues.

The rearrangement of the division of powers was demanded by the provinces—a readjustment of sections 91 and 92. All of us agree, still, that that is solely a Canadian concern. But the fact is that Canada lacks the complete autonomy to do that. We lack the ultimate dignity of an independent nation with the power to amend its basic law, its constitution.

Our experience in the fifties, sixties and seventies convinces us that unanimous agreement between federal and provincial authorities on constitutional change is an illusion. I need only refer you to what Senator Wood, in her thoroughly researched speech, said yesterday in connection with the continual succession of federal-provincial conferences which failed to achieve unanimous agreement. The provinces would never agree to vest solely in the federal authority the power to amend the Constitution. The federal authority could not abdicate its role by handing such powers to the provinces.

• (1630)

Many attempts have been made to reconcile the differences. To name just a few, there was: the Fulton-Favreau formula; the Victoria formula; the Vancouver formula; and the Toronto consensus. All of these suggested methods of making amendments fell somewhat short of unanimity.

Honourable senators, a deadlock is not an acceptable state of affairs. No nation can reasonably condemn itself to stand still. Reform continues to be the basis of progress.

In looking at the dilemma which does obtain, I think we should remind ourselves of a few basic principles. We should keep in mind the following series of ideas. The existing Constitution of Canada is a statute of the Parliament of the United Kingdom. It prescribes for the organization of a federal state. The central or federal authority is Parliament. Parliament is designed to govern the nation as a whole. It is designed, and I quote from the act, "to make Laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada." Again I would quote the act, it is designed to make laws "for the general Advantage of Canada." Its jurisdiction is general. It has the residual power.

Parliament is not the Prime Minister; it is not the cabinet, it is not the government; and it is not the executive. Parliament is the monarch, the Senate and its members, and the House of Commons and its members. To carry on, the government must, of course, retain the confidence of the Commons. But in Parliament are the representatives, the spokesmen, of all of the people of Canada. In the Commons they are elected; in the Senate they are appointed. They come from all regions. They come from all provinces. They come from every riding. They are the people who have the power to exercise, by their vote, the authority conferred by the British North America Act upon Parliament, the central authority. As such, as I conceive it, it is their duty to act according to their lights, for the peace, order and good government of Canada, for the general advantage of Canada, for the welfare of the nation as a whole.

The duty cast by the statute on the provinces, their governments, their legislatures and their members is different. Their jurisdiction is not for the nation as a whole. It is over matters "of merely local or private Nature in the Province." They act within provincial boundaries, as Senator Nurgitz has said. Under the statute, this is the beginning and the end of their authority.

The agreements of 1865—prior to Confederation—were the agreements which produced this result. It was an agreement to establish a federation, but a federation organized under a statute. That was the compact—to be organized under a statute. One does not look behind a statute to interpret a statute. In other words, the scheme of Confederation, as described in the statute, provides for two primacies—as Senator Nurgitz would say, two sovereignties. One is for Parliament, its components and its members, in matters of national concern. The other primacy is for the legislatures, their components and their members in matters of local, private or provincial concerns.

Ever since 1926, and certainly since 1931, methods have been used to attempt to bridge this gap between these jurisdictions. Tax-rental agreements, shared-cost programs and the like have been one method. Federal-provincial meetings of first ministers, of other ministers and of officials have been another method. A new accommodation was sought for both jurisdictions, federal and provincial.

Honourable senators, agreements have succeeded but, conferences, as Senator Wood demonstrated yesterday, have failed to provide a permanent arrangement. The present resolution is designed for the establishment of a lasting method to adjust, as needs emerge in the country, and to escape from the rigidities which result from the two jurisdictions imposed by the statute.

It seems that if we patriate our Constitution without an amending procedure requiring less than unanimous consent, we shall exacerbate the frustrations, we will probably continue in the deadlock we have experienced, and we will certainly delay constitutional reform on more vital issues.

It is irrelevant, I think, to discuss which level of government is senior or junior to the other. The fact is that they are different, in role, in function and in purpose. Some provinces have huge territories, have great resources, have large populations. But that does not alter the case. The statute invests them with authority for local, private or provincial matters.

Honourable senators, for generations federal governments, consistent with their duty to act in the interests of the nation as a whole, have strived to accommodate the changing conditions in the provinces and in all of Canada. The ultimate solution involves full control of our own Constitution, with a suitable method of amending it.

From time to time the federal authority has sought to use powers not allocated to it by the Constitution. When these proposals are designed to help the provinces, primarily, and, especially financially, the agreements are very swiftly made. As examples, I would mention old age security, tax sharing, equalization payments, medicare and higher education. However, more recently, provincial demands for greater jurisdiction in the field of resource control, offshore mining, international trade and fisheries, have been resisted by some provinces and by the federal government.

The existing desire for, and expectation of, unanimous agreement, which seems to have been a motive within the federal-provincial conference, has been a self-imposed restriction. It has provoked deadlock, unacceptably slow progress, bargaining, bickering and hostility within the 11 groups which form the federal-provincial conference.

Honourable senators, on a personal note, may I say that I watched with dismay this process from the inside in the 1960s, when I used to attend meetings of the attorneys general and the first ministers. I have watched them since from the outside, and I am still dismayed.

• (1640)

The thing about the resolution that I believe is more important than perhaps any other item in it is the fact that it contains a formula to attempt to dissolve the unholy deadlock which plagues us.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Connolly: We should stand back and look at some aspects of the resolution. Basically, the formula proposed to break the deadlock is the Victoria formula, contained in clause 45. If that formula is accepted, for the first time in the written Constitution the provinces will become involved in constitutional amendment.

But clause 45 is not definitively imposed by this proposal. Clauses 36 and 41 enact an interim rule of unanimity for all constitutional amendments. This regime, requiring unanimous consent, will last for two years from the passing of the proposed bill. But that period of two years may be abridged in one of two ways. The following are the two methods to shorten the two-year period. The first is that if the 11 governments agree within that two-year period upon a permanent amending formula to replace the Victoria, from that time on clause 45 will be replaced.

I should note, in passing, that in the first two years a federal-provincial conference must be called annually. The 11 first ministers will therefore have two opportunities in that period—if it should last so long—to discuss and decide what they want to do about a permanent amending formula.

The second method is that if the 11 governments fail to agree, in that two-year period, on a new, permanent, or relatively permanent, amending formula, the provinces have another option. Before dealing with that option, may I note that—and this is only on the legalities and legalistics of the proposal—part V deals only with the interim amending formula, clauses 36 to 44. It does not apply to the making of a general amendment. It is confined to the amendment of the Victoria formula, of clause 45—the permanent amending formula.

As to the second option to shorten the two-year period when unanimous consent is required immediately after the passage of the proposed bill, we must remember that unanimous agreement has eluded the 11 governments—there is a deadlock. This resolution, to resolve that deadlock, proposes that any province, during the first two years, may propose an amendment to the Victoria formula, to clause 45, and if such amendment is approved by the legislatures of seven provinces, with a population of 80 per cent of all of the provinces, a national referendum will automatically be triggered. That referendum must be held within two years after the consents of the seven provinces have been deposited in accordance with the law.

The choice in this referendum, on the ballot, will be one of two items. The first is: Do you approve the new formula as proposed and agreed to by the seven provincial legislatures? The alternative is: Do you agree with the Victoria formula as it is in Clause 45; or, if the federal Parliament, both houses, approve a new substitute for the Victoria formula, at least 90 days before the voting day, do you approve of that as the alternative to the provincial proposal? For the approval of one of those items, a majority of voters who vote at that time is required.

The result of the referendum—either approval of the Victoria formula, or of the new amending formula to replace Victoria or the approval of the provincial proposal—will mean, whichever happens, that clause 45 from then on, whether or not amended, will be the amending formula, and the two-year unanimous rule will no longer apply.

May I deal briefly with the Continuing Amending Procedure? Let us assume that within the first two years after the proposed bill passes the Parliament of the United Kingdom, no change is made in the Victoria formula, which is then in place. At that time the Senate or the House of Commons, or any provincial legislature, may pass a resolution for constitutional amendment on any item of the Constitution, including the amending formula itself.

To be effective, such proposed amendment will require the approval—I speak generally here—of each house of Parliament, of the two central provinces, of two Atlantic provinces, and of two western provinces representing 50 per cent of the population of the four western provinces. Let us say that Parliament approves the proposed amendment, and that some but not all of the required provincial consents are given within a year after Parliament acts. We then have a deadlock if we do not get the six-province concurrence. That too will trigger a referendum. It must be held within a further two years. The question will then be a simple one; there will not be an alternative: Do you approve of the amending formula proposed by Parliament?

To simplify this complicated procedure, let us say that Parliament, with its members representing all the constituencies, provinces and regions—the national legislature with a duty to act—in its wisdom approves an amendment to the Constitution. Let us say, too, that five provinces fail to agree. Without an escape hatch, we are back into a deadlock. The escape hatch is the referendum.

What is proposed by this resolution, in order to break the deadlock, is that Parliament will consult with the people—and that is only proper, because to the people belongs the Constitution. It does not belong to Parliament. It does not belong to the legislatures. It does not belong to the politicians. The question will be a simple one: Do you approve the amendment proposed by Parliament? There may be a better way, honourable senators, but none was proposed by any outside witness or received any kind of support from the committee.

• (1650)

Honourable senators, our problem has been derived from our concept of the need for unanimity in matters of this kind. That has been a source of frustration since 1931. It has created deadlock, standstill, stalemate, impasse, a log jam, a hangup, a blind alley, a cul-de-sac. Part VI of this resolution may not be the best method of dealing with that deadlock, but it seems to me to be the best method available.

Honourable senators, the story of the development of Canada, of national policies of self-reliance in political and economic affairs, has been a stormy one, but I think a creditable one. The Canadian people have a native, ingrained love of freedom, a desire to be master of their own destiny, to be maître chez nous, to pay our own way. Our population has been small and scattered, our territories vast and diverse. Canadian policies have been influenced much by climate, distance and diversity. But Canadians have been a confident and optimistic people. Perhaps that optimism was best expressed by the Honourable D'Arcy McGee in his Confederation speeches when he talked about the magnitude of our resources, and particularly the ingenuity, industry and will of our people. The story of the economic development of the country is for another day. The process of economic development will, I hope, be never-ending.

However, it is of the constitutional development of the country that I would speak for a few moments—and not in a narrow, partisan or party context. All Canadians must remember with great gratitude that it was the Conservative Party, under Sir John A. Macdonald and his colleagues, which, in the middle 1860s, saw the great chance. Those people presided over the birth of the new establishment. They guided the first great steps to nationhood, to unity and self-sufficiency. If most of the milestones which I identify now were achieved under Liberal administrations, it was because the Liberal governments were longer in office, and more often, and had a strong purpose for reform.

I begin with the navy bill of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1910, and which contributed to his defeat in 1911. The principle of that bill was that we would rely upon ourselves, our own resources, to provide naval defences to the extent that we could, rather than make contributions to the Royal Navy. Sir Wilfrid was a generation before his time. But the value of the step he then took was proved in the tremendous work done by the Royal Canadian Navy in the Second World War. I remember the Honourable Angus Macdonald saying, at the time, that every day he was at the Navy, he had a feeling he was doing no more than carrying out the policies of Sir Wilfrid.

Sir Robert Borden guided the war effort between 1914 and 1918. It was costly in lives and in treasury, but Canada emerged from it with a new stature. So highly acknowledged was that stature that Sir Robert insisted upon signing the Treaty of Versailles on behalf of this country himself.

Mr. King was in office in 1926, and in that year there was an election. Some honourable senators may agree with some of the critical historians about events which led up to the election. But one thing about its results was very clear: It established for all time in this country that the monarch's representative, the Governor General, must take his advice from his Canadian Prime Minister. In the same year an imperial conference was held, and the Balfour Declaration, to which I have earlier referred, was made. In the same year the North Pacific Halibut Treaty, with respect to the fishery in the Pacific, was signed at Washington. This was the first treaty ever signed on behalf of Canada by a Canadian minister. That minister was Mr. Lapointe.

Mr. Bennett was in office in 1930 and he adhered very strongly to the propositions embodied in the Balfour Declaration of 1926. He was the Canadian Prime Minister when the Statute of Westminster was passed and when the Colonial Laws Validity Act was deemed inapplicable to the six dominions at the conference.

Mr. King was back in office in 1939 when war was declared. He insisted, from the beginning, that the instrument for the declaration of war should be signed by His Majesty personally. The Order in Council was passed by the Canadian government.

I think little need be said now about the magnificence of the Canadian war effort and how it proved to be a distinctive Canadian operation. It was mounted, directed and conducted by Canadians. Its three forces were magnificent. In addition, Canada had a tremendous production effort. She became an important and integral part of the arsenal of the west. She co-operated strongly with her principal allies, the United States and the United Kingdom. At the end of the war this country forgave the war debt, amounting to $2 billion, which was incurred by the United Kingdom. It was natural, therefore, in 1945, when the United Nations was formed, that Canada should be sought out as one of the founding partners.

In 1949 Mr. St. Laurent was in office, and he was responsible for the amendment to section 91(1) of the B.N.A. Act which gave Parliament jurisdiction to amend the B.N.A. Act in federal matters. He, too, brought in chapter 37 of the Statutes of 1949, which gave ultimate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court of Canada and abolished appeals to the Privy Council. In 1952, despite controversy, he appointed the first Canadian Governor General, the Right Honourable Vincent Massey.

Mr. Diefenbaker's government proposed an amending formula to which Mr. Fulton's name was attached. This formula was rejected by the provinces and the frustration continued, just as it did as a result of Mr. Favreau's modifications later. The Fulton-Favreau formula is one of the milestones along this same rocky road.

When Mr. Pearson came to office in 1963, the stature and the wealth of Canada permitted a better contribution in the field of foreign aid, a unique contribution in the field of peace-keeping, and the proclamation of a Canadian flag.

● (1700)

There were many noisy demonstrations against it. There were dire warnings that it would destroy our national unity. "Pearson's pennant" it was called. Yet now we acknowledge it proudly as our appropriate national symbol.

Our history, honourable senators, is a story of inexorable progress towards national self-sufficiency and national independence. This progress has been made through the years, not by revolution but by evolution. And so, too, it is with this last step. In the light of this series of events, I believe that any Canadian government could claim a clear mandate to move on this resolution now. Of course, there may be more compelling reasons for this government to do so.

I am not too concerned about the criticism based upon unilateral action. On the basis of my conception of the relative rules and functions of the federal and provincial authorities, on the basis of my perception of the achievements of successive Canadian governments along the road to full Canadian independence, on the basis of my assessment, and that of Senator Wood, of the futile attempts by federal governments and the provinces to devise an acceptable amending formula, I strongly support the government today when it declares, "Now is the time."

That decision had to be made many times before, and many times decisions of the kind were controversial. Yet Canada is the better for those decisions having been made. The time has come for Parliament to discharge its last great duty along this road. It is consistent with its constitutional role to do so. I shall be proud to be a member of a parliament to which this opportunity is given.

I cannot too highly commend the Prime Minister of this country who, despite unwarranted and personal invective and criticism, has steadfastly pursued a purpose which, as I conceive it, it is his duty to pursue.

There is a host of significant Canadian names associated with this process, in addition to the names of the prime ministers I have mentioned, though they are not all on the same side of the argument. I think of statesmen like Cartier,

Thompson, Brown, Blake, Doherty, Aylesworth, and Lapointe particularly, and Mowatt, Fulton and Favreau, and, on the basis of his performance before the committee and throughout the summer, I include Chrétien in that group.

I think of men like Dandurand, Meighen, Hugessen, and, indeed, Forsey of this house. I think of great public servants like Skelton, Christie, Todd, Bourinot, MacNeill, O'Connor, Sirois, Deutsch, Robertson and Heeney.

I think of academics like Kennedy, Brady, Rogers, Cory, Dawson, Wrong, Lower, Morton, Gérin-Lajoie, Monpetit, MacDonald and Angus.

I think of Lords of the Privy Council such as Haldane and Watson. I think of judges such as Duff, Rand, Anglin, Migneault, Rinfret, Taschereau and Newcombe.

I think of great lawyers like Lafleur, Tilley, Geoffrion and Beaulieu.

I think of journalists like Dafoe, Willison, Fergusson, Dexter, Hutchison and, indeed, our old friend, Grattan O'Leary.

These are not all of the people who have been involved in this process, and they are not all dead.

Honourable senators, it is Parliament which has the broad legislative responsibility in matters affecting the nation as a whole. It is not the provincial governments. Parliamentarians must not forget their proper and acknowledged representative and legislative roles. They have the right, they have the duty, to preside over national welfare. They have a high status in this respect. They have a noble purpose. These rights and duties are different from those of the provincial governments, of the provincial legislatures and of their members. This issue which is before us is essentially a national issue, for the general advantage of Canada.

In my humble estimation, Parliament should adopt this resolution.

On motion of Senator McIlraith, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-54—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, March 4, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Barrow calling the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject-matter of Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, tabled in the Senate on March 2, 1981.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am conscious that we are descending from the exalted realms of constitutional discussion to some very mundane comments on one or two aspects of the committee report on the subject-matter of Bill C-54. My only promise is that while I am not entirely sure that I will edify the members of the Senate, I will nevertheless try not to detain them too long.

My first point has to do with this undertaking given by the Prime Minister to the people of Canada during the election campaign, in which he said:

> We will hold the line on government expenditure growth under the rate of the gross national product.

I raised that point previously and pointed out that the gross national product was not forecast to rise as fast as the budget, the budget rising at the rate of 12.8 per cent. I wish I could say that that was a correct report of the situation, but I am afraid I have underestimated the ability of the people in charge of budget expenditures in Canada to restrain their appetite because, when looking through the estimates, I took note of the fact that the subsidy on imported oil was going down. It was $2,830 million in the fiscal year that is just ending, and was estimated to cost only $350 million in the coming fiscal year. It struck me that that was a rather odd situation. Could it be possible that the subsidy on oil was actually decreasing in the next fiscal year, when we know what is happening to the price of oil, and what has happened to the supplies of oil?

It soon became apparent that that could not possibly be the case, and I was prompted to look into the matter a little further. I discovered that it is indeed not the case, and that more money will be spent on the oil subsidy program in the coming fiscal year than ever before.

What happened? What happened is very simple. The government simply decided that the money they were going to raise under the petroleum compensation tax would simply not be included in the accounts of the budgetary expenditures. A very neat little operation, if you can get away with it. So, on the basis of comparison between one year and another the figures ought to include the money that is being raised under the petroleum compensation tax, which is now excluded from the government expenditure figures, for reasons which entirely escape me, and if you recapture that obvious tax and expenditure, which is moving through the public accounts, you find that we have to add some $2.7 billion more to the subsidy for imported oil than it shows in the accounts. If this amount is added to the total figure, then the expenditures of the government, I am afraid, amount to some $70 billion, not $67.8 billion, as they suggested, and the increase is 16.7 per cent. It seems to me that somebody ought to take note of this fact, because no auditor would have given his certificate to the information which has been presented to this chamber. Auditors like to point out in their standard certificate that the accounts are on a comparable basis, one year with another. That is certainly not the case in this respect. I do not believe that any self-respecting auditor would be able to proffer these figures without an observation on this point. Perhaps he or she would even go as far as to refuse to certify the accounts as correct.

• (1710)

I would like to bring to the attention of the chamber that the actual increase, if this sleight-of-hand business in connection with the subsidy on imported oil is added back, amounts to 16.7 per cent. This is a fantastic increase during a period when the government pledged that the increase would not exceed the rate of increase in the gross national product. So that pledge is certainly doubly dishonoured, in my opinion.

If you want to search a little further through the public accounts, you can find another place where the government has done exactly the same thing, and that is in connection with the cost of unemployment insurance. By changing the rules, the government is raising $1.1 billion more from the employers and workers of the country by means of what amounts to a payroll tax for unemployment insurance. But that extra levy also does not go through the public accounts. I have not calculated what the effect of that would be in terms of percentage, but, obviously, it would increase it beyond the 16.7 per cent increase I have already mentioned. So it seems to me that it is impossible to comprehend the real meaning of the activities of the government, if it refuses to provide a figure on a reasonably comparable basis from one year to another. Or, if it will not do that, at least it should have the candor to tell us what these changes are. Otherwise, we are completely at sea.

I mention this because it indicates even more forcibly the point I made the other day, that the government's economic pledges as made by the Prime Minister are certainly not being adhered to in this particular respect.

The second matter to which I would like to refer deals with the small business development bond situation, a matter which we have discussed before. As honourable senators may recall, I have suggested that we could increase the effectiveness of that measure by making it applicable to a wider range of activities. What has interested me is a report issued by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. In this report they estimate the advantages to the Canadian economy of the small business development bond plan. It is quite surprising, because you can never get anyone in the government to tell you what the effect of these measures is. Certainly, the committee did not seem to have inquired into the matter.

It is surprising because it is so meaningful, for, if their estimates are correct, the small business development bond fund policy will be extraordinarily effective, which is very good news for all of us. They estimate that it will increase jobs by some 36,000. They also estimate that the total contribution it will make to stimulating capital investment is impressive; and they say as well that there will be no net cost to the federal treasury because of gains to the tax system as a result of this improvement in activity. That is a very good thing and I am happy to report it to the house. I hope their figures, are correct, and that the committee, at some point, will take advantage of an opportunity to ask the small business people to come before it and develop their facts and explain how they arrived at those conclusions.

If the federation is correct, it would follow that if we expand this bond policy to include other forms of investment—besides those of a capital nature, such as real estate and machinery—praticularly working capital, which is the life blood of many small businesses and which is so badly affected by interest rates today, we might have an even greater multiplier effect. If we were to abandon the restriction of this measure to only incorporated small businesses and extend it to the two-thirds or the great majority of small businesses which are unincorporated, we might find that the effect on our economy would be spectacular.

I regret that at the present time we are not able to verify the report made by the small business federation. I would certainly like to hear from them and get their views on what the result would be if the scope of this measure were expanded.

So, having raised those two subjects before honourable senators, and having had a chance to read the report of the committee, I thought I would offer these comments as indicating, on the one hand, my disappointment that we have apparently not been presented with accounts on a comparable basis and, therefore, have been unable properly to assess the impact of the government's policy and its full relationship to the Prime Minister's promises, which is a negative reaction, on the other hand. But in order to balance things off fairly, I would like to report the positive information, that I think I may give the house, with respect to the small business development bond policy and express the hope that one of these days it may be expanded along the lines I have previously suggested.

I thank honourable senators for their courtesy in hearing me.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I may add a few words to the point raised by Senator Roblin with regard to the small business loans. I received a letter from the Canadian Federation of Independent Business with regard to this subject. Unfortunately, I do not have it with me. However, I have a similar letter—it may even be identical—which was sent to Senator Barrow. The letter is dated February 25. I would like to read three paragraphs of that letter which I believe are relevant to the honourable senator's point. They say:

> On behalf of our 57,000 member companies, I wanted you to know how pleased we are with the decision to extend the small business development bond (SBDB) until year end. Since high interest rates are forecast to continue throughout 1981, the need for this program continues as well.
> As we are all aware, the federal deficit remains at an unacceptably high level. For that reason I think you will be pleased with the results of a study we have done on the economic impact of the SBDB.
> Our study concluded that the SBDB will produce a net revenue increase to the federal treasury of $77 million in the first year of full operation. We also estimate up to 36,000 new direct jobs will be created by this program. I have appended some highlights of our study for your information. If you wish further details, please let me know.

I have no objection to tabling the rest of the letter though I am doubtful that it will add anything to the point I wished to make. However, the letter is available if the honourable senator or anyone else would care to peruse it or believes that it should be tabled.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend. That is the same letter which stimulated my remarks. I am glad that the letter has been mentioned.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I would like to have a chance to examine Senator Roblin's allegations on his first point. Therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Flynn: On the first only?

Senator Frith: Yes.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 17, 1981, at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 2024)

NATIONAL FINANCE

ACCOMODATION PROGRAM OF DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS—ACCEPTANCE OF COMMITTEE'S RECOMMENDATIONS—STATEMENTS AT MEETING OF COMMITTEE ON THURSDAY, MARCH 12,1981

Hon. Douglas D. Everett (Chairman): I am pleased to welcome today to this special and important meeting of our Committee the Honourable Donald Johnston, President of the Treasury Board, and the Honourable Paul Cosgrove, Minister of Public Works.

Before inviting the two ministers to speak, I want to remind members of the events leading up to this meeting and make a few brief comments on its significance.

In September 1978, the Committee issued its report on the Accommodation Program of the federal government—the culmination of two years of work. This was the third major enquiry into a large government program which the Committee had undertaken under its mandate to review government expenditure.

Apart from officials of the Department of Public Works and the Treasury Board, the Committee invited as witnesses —representatives of client departments,

—senior officials with experience of accommodation problems of the governments of Ontario, British Columbia and the United States,

—the heads of the real estate departments of two of the largest corporations in Canada, —representatives of associations of architects, consulting engineers, developers and heritage groups.

From the enormous volume of materials acquired through the hearings, the Committee fashioned a report which reviewed all aspects of the Accommodation Program. Among the sixty-two (62) recommendations, the two most important were that the Department of Public Works should become the government's common service agency for the provision of real property services and that the department should operate on a revenue dependent basis. Under revenue dependency, as proposed by the Committee, the Department would lease crown-owned general purpose buildings to government departments and agencies at market equivalent rents and would, in turn, derive from these rents the revenue necessary to cover its regular operations. The Committee concluded that such a system would subject the Department of Public Works to sound financial discipline and would heighten cost-consciousness among departments and agencies, thus resulting in a more economical use of space.

In March, 1979, six months after the tabling of the report by the Committee we invited the two departments most directly involved to report on progress in reviewing and implementing our proposals. On that occasion, while reporting that the government was adopting a majority of the recommendations, the Ministers said they needed time to consider the two major proposals. At the conclusion of that meeting I said, "It is our intention to invite you back . . . to see how you are getting along with the recommendations".

I am pleased to observe that the Ministers have responded to that invitation. I am particularly delighted by their decision to announce the new government policy on accommodation at a meeting of this Committee. I regard this as recognition by them of the thoughtful, serious work of this Committee. On behalf of all members, I express our satisfaction at this response to our deliberations.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): I am pleased to have this opportunity to tell you of the progress that has been made by the Government of Canada in the field of real property policy as a result of the recommendations that your Committee made in September 1978 on the Accommodation Program of the Department of Public Works.

You will recall that on March 20, 1979, my predecessor, The Honourable Judd Buchanan, reported to you that action was being taken as a result of most of your recommendations. It is therefore my pleasure today to report to you on the work that has been done over the past two years. In my own remarks, I would like to concentrate on improvements that have been made in two major areas of government operations.

The first area of improvement is in the administrative policies of the government under which departments manage their real property and accommodation. The second is the approval in principle by the Cabinet of a system which will provide accommodation and professional services by the Department of Public Works on a revenue-dependent basis, subject to an evaluation of the systems to be put in place by Public Works Canada. My comments will deal both with the real property policies and with the question of revenue dependency.

First the real property policies. The best way to give you some idea of the magnitude of the changes in real property management policy is to point out that we have had to expand our earlier administrative policy chapter on Real Property Management into four chapters. These four chapters constitute a "family" of policies in respect to real property. I am pleased to provide you with these documents today.

The new policy provisions reinforce existing government policy, which requires that federal real property be managed economically and efficiently, and that it be managed so as to combine the efficient provision of government services with the achievement of wider social, economic and environmental objectives.

These new policy provisions provide guidance for the complete spectrum of real property management activities; all aspects of the acquisition, use and disposal of real property are covered. An analytical method for determining the most economical means of acquiring real property has been introduced. This in particular addresses some of the most serious concerns that you had expressed in your report. The procedure by which real property is reviewed to ensure that it is fully utilized has been improved. The policy principle that you recommended to provide improved access for the handicapped has been included. The direction on the disposal of surplus real properties has been clarified. In particular, the provision that required that surplus land be retained has been deleted.

A number of provisions more clearly define the circumstances in which tenders are to be invited for leased accommodation. As a general practice, tenders are to be invited through advertisement in one or more newspapers for leases of over 250 square metres. For leases under this size, tenders may be called by invitation to a representative list of suppliers.

I feel these provisions are particularly important in providing greater private sector access to government leasing requirements. Furthermore, they will generate competition among suppliers, resulting in better rental deals for the government. Accommodation leasing costs exceed $200 million per year, and Public Works Canada alone has over 2,600 leased premises from coast to coast.

Other provisions are designed to provide an improved basis for the letting of federal real property to other levels of government and to the private sector, including a firm and consistent basis upon which departments can make federal real property available to community organizations.

The number of letting transactions has grown in recent years, covering a wide range of situations and providing revenues in excess of $100 million annually. For example, space in airport terminals and national parks is set aside for commercial uses such as restaurants, souvenir shops and car rental offices. Commercial space is rented in government office buildings and in heritage areas. Office space in government buildings temporarily not needed for government operations is rented for other purposes. All of these activities are covered by the new policy.

An office accommodation planning method based on the functions of the occupants has been developed and will shortly be included in the DPW procedures manual so that it will be available to office planners. The Treasury Board Office Accommodation Control Standard will be reviewed to ensure that it continues to provide for a high degree of Treasury Board control over the amount of office accommodation made available to the Public Service.

My colleague, the Honourable Paul Cosgrove, Minister of Public Works, will be outlining for you shortly the tasks that are ahead of his Department in moving towards Revenue Dependency. However, I thought I might take a few minutes to place this major management initiative in an over-all government perspective.

I am certain that you all have noted the various proposals and new thrusts by the present government to improve or strengthen financial management controls—and indeed, management in general. These improvements and changes are prompted by concerns the government had—and still has—which led to a variety of studies and recommendations by various bodies, among them, the Office of the Auditor General and the Public Accounts Committee. The government has also profited from the advice of the Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability—the Lambert Commission—outside consultants and, in the case of the major changes we are announcing today, from the advice of your own Committee.

The approval in principle by the Cabinet of the DPW Revenue Dependency System takes on a particular importance in this context. Simply put, departments and agencies would be expected, in the future, to be charged market prices for their accommodation and professional services subject, of course, to the evaluation of the systems. An important benefit, and one that is the recurring theme of many other recent proposals is that of greater accountability—including greater accountability to the taxpayers of Canada. It was in response to this theme that the Government created the Office of the Comptroller General of Canada, which, along with Treasury Board Canada, reports to me.

In the months ahead as the Comptroller General's major program on Improvements in Management Practices and Controls, the IMPAC Program, comes to fruition, I look for even greater tightening of the strands of accountability, efficiency and effectiveness. The DPW Revenue Dependency System will be developed in close co-operation with the Comptroller General and will form an integral part of DPW's own IMPAC Program. Equally as important as accountability and better financial management through these initiatives is the improved visibility of how we are spending taxpayers' dollars. The systems to be developed by Public Works Canada will help achieve exactly that end—as well as saving us money!

Under the Revenue Dependency System, departments will be responsible for planning their accommodation and professional service requirements, justifying them to Treasury Board, funding them in Main Estimates, and defending them before the parliamentary committees. Accountability will be demonstrated at each of these levels.

You will recall that over the last 20 years there has been a significant increase in the number of cost-recovery systems in government, systems through which departments charge out to the users of their services the expenses they incur in providing those services. The DPW Revenue Dependency System will represent a significant advance over these existing cost-recovery systems. It will provide, through its use of market prices, a standard of comparison and an objective control limit, over and above the normal cost controls of government.

The move to the DPW Revenue Dependency System will affect all departments of government and require major changes in the administrative and financial systems of the Public Service. Before these changes are made, Cabinet has directed that an evaluation based on a simulation be carried out.

In any move towards revenue dependency, the role of Treasury Board Canada will be four-fold.

—to provide over-all policy direction and guidance for all federal real estate activities;

—to promulgate and monitor standards for accommodation and services;

—to review and approve the budgets of both Public Works and other departments, plus their requests for appropriations and fee schedules; and —to participate in the evaluation program.

Public Works Canada is one of the oldest government departments, and it is thus fitting that it should be in the vanguard of the changing processes of bringing improvement to our methods of conducting government business.

Thank you very much for your attention. I will be available to answer questions after Mr. Cosgrove has explained his department's changeover in detail.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, I would like to begin by thanking this committee for its hard work and serious counsel; without your effort we would not be about to embark down such an exciting—and challenging—road. The President of the Treasury Board of Canada and I know that you share our excitement in what will be an entirely new approach to managing a common service agency in government.

As you know, Public Works Canada is one of the largest construction and real property organizations in Canada. As such it has massive holdings of buildings and land in its own right, manages property for other government departments and agencies and provides millions of square metres of space for accommodation purposes.

The department, in seeking a type of improved management practice which would ensure "value for money", had our enthusiasm fired by this very committee when, in 1978, it recommended the need for changes in the management of government accommodation and in the operations of Public Works.

This committee and the Auditor General both suggested the department be run on a "revenue dependent" basis; and the Comptroller General's IMPAC study highlighted need for improvement in management practices and controls.

I would like to refer briefly to the 1978 report of your committee, which dealt with the accommodation program of Public Works.

On recommending that my department charge user departments market-equivalent rents for all general purpose accommodation, your committee reached the conclusion, I quote,

> "That revenue dependency is feasible and desirable and (the committee) recommends that the accommodation program of Public Works be operated on this principle."

It is indeed with some relish that we can now report to you that Public Works is about to embark on developing systems that respond to the recommendations made by your committee. I feel it is most certainly the best way to manage a department that is to all intents and purposes a large realty company working within the aegis of the Government of Canada.

The decision by cabinet is significant in that it will establish a single system for managing accommodation. Within this system departments will pay rent for space and fees for services they obtain from Public Works.

Rental cash flow and related expenses would be accounted for in one revolving fund, while a second revolving fund would account for Public Works' fees and expenses. Public Works would be expected to rely on these fees to pay for its own operating and management costs.

Capital construction costs and the provision of some specialized services will continue to be funded through parliamentary appropriations.

Formal agreements will be encouraged between Public Works and our clients; these will delineate services to be rendered as to time of delivery, quality of service, costs, etc. There will thereby be an objective means of assessing whether or not Public Works is delivering as agreed.

The effect will be to create better service for our clients, will lead to better management and financial control, and to savings for the government, which are objectives I know the committee fully supports.

And in addition to that, I believe implicitly that the new mode of operation will also raise the morale of Public Works employees for, if we do good work, it will be readily apparent.

There is no way in which this changeover can take place immediately because of the lead time needed to design and install the commercial-type accounting systems and change the budgeting and estimates process. As new systems are developed they will be put in place, and simulated processes will be used to familiarize staff with these systems.

A thorough evaluation of the complete system will take place according to terms of reference agreed to by officials of Treasury Board, office of the Comptroller General, Privy Council and Public Works. Copies of these terms of reference are available for your information. The start-up of actual charging will be set by the government only after this evaluation is completed.

I want to thank publicly first, those in my department who have laboured to bring us so far, but even more so the members of this committee. Without your recommendations we would not be in a position to begin our drive to provide the most positive answer to the government's concern for improved administrative effectiveness.

STATUS OF IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS

THE SENATE

Tuesday, March 17, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

TRIBUTES TO ST. PATRICK AND THE IRISH PEOPLE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I notice that the Honourable Senator Grosart is wearing a green tie, and I would like him to explain this phenomenon.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise, with your permission, to draw attention to the fact that the reason for the green tie is, of course, that this is March 17, the great day of the Irish and of St. Patrick, the patron saint of Ireland.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Grosart: I do so as one who was born in Ireland, a distinction which I share, I believe, only with Senator Andy Thompson. Andy is from the north and I am from the south, so between us we represent the whole born-in-Ireland contingent in the Senate and, I believe, in the Parliament of Canada. I do not say that this signifies the deterioration of our institution, but in the first Parliament there were 48 members who were born in Ireland. I rejoice, of course, in the fact that, in addition to Senator Thompson and myself, there are many here who have glorious streams of Irish blood in their veins. What else, in a Senate that has a Connolly, a Hayden, a Doody, a Riley, a Hicks, a Donahoe, a Sullivan, a Jacques Flynn, and many others who, like myself, have names that conceal the unique distinction of their ancestry.

On occasions such as this, when we Irish become sentimental about the land of our birth, we are sometimes asked by cynics, "Well, if you think so much of the beauty and glory of that land, why did you leave it?" That question was asked of another Irish emigrant to Australia many years ago. He was a notorious thief and pickpocket in Dublin. He became later a noted historian and, indeed, a poet in Australia. To explain why he and other convicts had left Ireland to go to Australia, he put it in these words:

> True patriots we,
> For be it understood:
> We left our country,
> For our country's good.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Grosart: In a more serious vein, honourable senators, this day on Parliament Hill makes us—Irish anyway, and perhaps all Canadians—think inevitably of the greatest Irish Canadian of all, the Honourable D'Arcy McGee, for it was on this day 113 years ago that he made his second to last speech in Parliament, a speech, interestingly enough, defending the British North America Act, the Constitution and the Confederation, which was then being debated in the first Parliament, just as it is still being debated in the thirty-second Parliament.

Senator Donahoe: We need him back.

Senator Grosart: Yes. It was said of him, and I think rightly so by common consent, that he was the most eloquent proponent of the Constitution and Confederation. Not many years before, D'Arcy McGee had been a fugitive from the rebellion of '48. With a price on his head he was smuggled out of Ireland by a monk, and in a monk's costume to America and eventually to Canada. Here, as I say, he became the most eloquent and certainly one of the most influential of those Fathers of Confederation who brought about our union.

It was just about this time, as Parliament was thinking in terms of the Easter recess, that he made his last speech. He left the Hill, walked down to Sparks Street, and at the door of his lodging house he was cut down by an assassin's bullet. D'Arcy McGee was a great Canadian and a great Irishman. He loved Canada and he loved Ireland. With understandable Irish nostalgia he wrote:

> Where'er I turned, some emblem still
> Roused consciousness upon my track;
> Some hill was like an Irish hill,
> Some wild bird's whistle called me back.

D'Arcy McGee was called back to a land which he described in these words:

> Good land—green land—dear Ireland,
> Though we cannot see you . . . still,
> May God's dew brighten all your skies,
> His sun kiss every hill.

Perhaps honourable senators will allow me to send from this Canada of ours to that troubled land of Ireland those words of D'Arcy McGee.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, once again Senator Grosart has demonstrated one of the characteristics of those of Irish descent, that of great eloquence. I am sure that all of us in the chamber, regardless of our racial origin, will want to join with Senator Grosart in the statement about the Irish he has made today. The closest any of my ancestors came to Ireland was Scotland. They never quite made it across the water barrier between the two countries.

Nevertheless, I would be the first to acknowledge, as I am sure would others who occupy seats in this chamber, the enormous contribution made by those of Irish descent to the development of Canada. The contributions those of Irish descent have made to the arts, to culture, to the professions, to the church, and to business have been significant and notable. In the political arena, their contribution has been totally disproportionate to the numbers they represent in our population. Canadians of Irish descent have a great penchant and ability for public life, and their contribution in that area has been of vast proportions. They have served Canada well, and they continue to do so.

At this point I yield the floor to my colleague, the deputy government leader, who can claim some Irish ancestry.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when my grandfather, Thomas Royce, left Ireland to come to Canada in the late 1800s perhaps there were some who thought that it was for the good of Ireland. I hope not, but certainly it was for my good. I can only claim to be 25 per cent Irish. The remaining portion consists of 50 per cent Scots, and the rest English. I do think that it is worthwhile saying on behalf of Senator Thompson, who represents the other 50 per cent of the Senate Irish caucus, that he would support what was said by Senator Grosart. He is probably as sorry as we are that he is not present to say so in his own way. With that brief comment, I will wait for Robbie Burns Day.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I am tempted to add a word because on this day, during the many years I sat in the Nova Scotia legislature, my desk was always draped with the shamrock, and I rose to pay tribute to the Irish, and to their contribution to the growth and development of Nova Scotia. Honourable senators will notice the pots of shamrock on Senator Doody's desk, Senator Flynn's desk and my desk. I put them there because I felt that this day should not go by without at least some of us marking our pride in our Irish descent.

My predecessor in this seat, Senator Harold Connolly, was a past president of the Charitable Irish Society of Halifax. If honourable senators go back into the history of that august society, which was founded in 1784 by Richard John Uniacke, an Irishman, they will find that ever since there has been a Senate and a Parliament of Canada, they have always had a representative of Irish descent from Halifax.

● (1410)

Last year, in speaking to the Charitable Irish Society, I had occasion to remind them that each of those senators who, in turn, occupied a seat in this chamber, had been past-president. In my presence here, I am continuing the long tradition of an Irish contribution to the Senate.

I remember my earlier predecessor, Senator Quinn, from a time when I was too young to be here and too young to participate. I am told that on this day he rose and treated this august chamber to the sound of his melodious voice singing Irish songs. I can assure you, honourable senators, I have no intention of inflicting anything like that upon you.

Some Hon. Senators: Come on.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Donahoe: This is a day that raises the hearts and the pride of Irish people wherever they may be. I was moved and touched by Senator Grosart's remarks respecting that great Canadian and Irishman, D'Arcy McGee.

I merely rise in my place here to make my small contribution to the recognition of this most respected and revered national day.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I take great pleasure in rising on a question of privilege which is somewhat related to what has just been said about the Irish. I must say, in rising on this question of privilege, that I am quite a hockey buff. In addition, I am considered one of the founding members of the Acadian University of Moncton.

Now, last Sunday, the University of Moncton, a young university founded in 1962, won the Canadian Inter-University Hockey championship. I watched the game with great interest.

Senator Asselin: Who was the coach?

Senator Robichaud: Jean Perron, who is an outstanding university hockey coach.

So, I watched the game; the Moncton University was playing against the Regina University Huskies. The score was 2-2 and there were nine seconds left. Bessette scored a point, making it 3 to 2 and four seconds before the end, he scored another point making the final score, 4 to 2.

I therefore want to congratulate the coach, Jean Perron, as well as all the players on the hockey team of Moncton University, the only Acadian university which, along the way, managed to beat Saint Francis Xavier University, the Irish university at Antigonish.

[English]

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, as you are well aware, I do not rise as an Irishman. I was once told that some of my ancestors were in Ireland, but they couldn't make a living there.

I especially want to draw the attention of those of Irish descent to the fact that, although they talk about paying their respects to the wonderful people of that great country, Saskatchewan has done something about it. There are two adjoining towns in Saskatchewan named after D'Arcy McGee—D'Arcy, Saskatchewan and McGee, Saskatchewan. I thought they would be interested to know that the Irish had been honoured in that way.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

REPORT OF LIBRARIAN TABLED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the annual report of the Parliamentary Librarian for the fiscal year 1979-80.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

THE ESTIMATES

PUBLIC SERVICE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, last Thursday I directed a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development concerning the government's commitment to take steps to reduce the size of the public service, a commitment which was broken when the main estimates provided for an increase of 3,085 person-years during 1981-82. The minister, you will recall, dismissed my effort to elicit actual government policy on this question by asserting that, obviously, the government would increase, where necessary, the personnel allocations for law enforcement, fisheries surveillance and other essential services.

I draw to the minister's attention Fact Sheet No. 6, which is part of the package that accompanied the estimates. Allowing that some of the personnel increases of those agencies and departments whose staff will increase by more than 100 per cent in 1981-82 could loosely be described as essential, I would ask the minister how he rationalizes staff increases of 790 for Taxation, 554 for Customs and Excise, and 507 for Energy, Mines and Resources as far as relating to either law enforcement or fisheries surveillance?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, it would not be very hard to make the argument but it might take quite a long time and, therefore, I will not try to do so. If I am simply asked my opinion as to how we can apply those increases to the criteria, I am sure that Senator Donahoe would not argue that in the Taxation Department income tax returns and other related things need to be dealt with within a reasonably short time. Whatever staff is necessary for that ought to be in place. My honourable friend will also recognize that there are a number of new activities with respect to the National Energy Program and, certainly, we want them to be administered by competent staff in an efficient way.

● (1420)

Senator Donahoe: I have a supplementary question. I would further draw to the minister's attention the fact that following his reply on a previous day I checked the reports of the statement of last April, in which the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Johnston, made his commitment to reduce person-years in the public service. My research has failed to reveal even a hint of a suggestion that person-years might actually increase by as much as one, let alone over 3,000 in 1985. If the government were to decide that further taxation for services, for example, was essential for the individual security of Canadians, can the minister indicate when the government altered its policy in this particular matter?

Senator Olson: I will take that question as notice, and will endeavour to find some instances where there have been some reductions. I do not have that information at my fingertips at this moment.

Senator Donahoe: As my final supplementary, I would ask the minister for details, if he can obtain them, about the government's supposed painless means of reducing the public service. In his April statement, the President of the Treasury Board said that he "would unveil within a month details of this new painless policy."

Allowing that my inability to find such a statement does not necessarily mean that one was never made, I would be grateful if the minister could bring to the Senate complete details of the program by which the government "painlessly" cuts the size of the public service while increasing its size this year by more than 3,000.

Senator Olson: Without accepting any of those arguments, I will take the substance of the question, which is to try to find out whether or not a statement was made. If so, I will bring it to the Senate as soon as I get it.

ENERGY

OIL—ATLANTIC PROVINCES—SECURITY OF SUPPLY

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. As he is probably aware, the Persian Gulf oil exporters meet today and they may decide on a large cutback in crude oil production, to take effect upon cessation of the war between Iran and Iraq.

So that Atlantic Canadians, in particular, can be assured of continued security of supply, would the minister bring to the Senate a progress report on imports from Mexico, including long-range meteorological forecasts bearing upon shipping in the Gulf of Mexico?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Yes, honourable senators, I will try to get that information, although my honourable friend should realize one other fact with respect to the meeting of OPEC ministers. One of the things they are considering—or, at least, were reported to be considering—is a reduction because, to use their term, there is an oil glut in the world. If that is so, it would seem that the supplies we might need over the next few weeks or months will be relatively easy to obtain, albeit at a price higher than some of the other oil that is available to us.

Senator Muir: Thank you. It would seem to me that over the next few months we shall have to look a little farther than that.

I have a supplementary. Has the government analyzed its potential supply situation in the event of large cutbacks, and would the minister share with us that information? In other words, for how long can we anticipate this so-called glut lasting, ensuring a plentiful supply? Has the minister any information to the effect that we have a plentiful supply for a long period of time?

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, I suppose it is the continuing responsibility of the government—which it takes very seriously—to ensure that there are adequate supplies of crude oil in Canada in the various positions where it is required.

With regard to the second part of the honourable senator's question, as to how long is "long", I do not believe that attempts have been made to absolutely guarantee supplies for years into the future. We assume that the sources of supply will be providing those requirements as time unfolds; but I can assure my honourable friend that the government is indeed cognizant of its responsibility to do what it can to ensure that there are supplies for the projected periods of time that have been considered valid in the past.

Senator Muir: That brings me to a further supplementary. In view of the fact that the minister and the government seem to have changed their minds in connection with what we were told here and in the other place a few years ago, that there were plentiful supplies of oil in Canada that would be forthcoming for years to come, which did not develop, I trust that the predictions and forecasts will be much better on this occasion.

● (1425)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there is no change in my view that there are supplies in Canada for years and years to come. What is a problem at the moment is the timing of the commencement of production of the processing plants that are needed to put those supplies into the consumer stream. My honourable friend will recognize at once, I am sure, that this government has done everything possible to get those processing plants in place so that much larger and more secure supplies of oil from Canadian sources will be available to Canadian consumers.

Senator Muir: Well, honourable senators, when the honourable gentleman and I sat in the other place we did have official information from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources along the lines I have suggested. All I am saying is that I hope that in the future forecasts will not be as erroneous as those were.

THE ESTIMATES

REDUCTION IN ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT ENVELOPE

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

On Thursday last I asked Senator Olson a question about the main estimates, and about the fact that the main economic development envelope was provided with $282 million less than the budget had allocated for economic development. The minister replied by saying that in fact the estimates had provided for a 22 per cent increase over the budget in so far as economic development is concerned. I wonder if the minister still stands by that statement.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, this question provides me with an opportunity to provide what would otherwise have been a delayed answer to the question raised by Senator Charbonneau on March 12, which concerns the size of the economic development envelope.

The difference noted by Senator Charbonneau between the amounts shown for the economic development envelope in the October 1980 budget and the main estimates for 1981-82 occurs because of a change in presentation. At the time of the October 1980 budget the distribution of planned outlays by envelope did not include the following centrally recorded adjustments: the revisions to cost estimates of on-going programs to be made at the time of final preparation of the main estimates; the repayment of previous years' loans that are now offset by new loans.

In the expenditure plan by envelope, however, as shown in Part I of the 1981-82 main estimates, the envelopes have been adjusted to reflect these items. I am therefore able to assure the honourable senator that there has been no reduction or lessening of priority with regard to economic development.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE—OBSERVER STATUS FOR SENATORS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. This concerns the Law of the Sea Conference.

Since the Law of the Sea Conference is so important to Canada, and since it has been continuing for quite a number of years, has there ever been an allocation of observer status to members of this chamber, as well as to members of the other place, at that conference?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not aware of any such official request for the Senate to designate observers or participants for the Law of the Sea Conference. Certainly, however, an inquiry will be made.

Senator Marshall: As I understand it, the office of the President of the Privy Council sends to both parties an allocation of observer seats at different times during the Law of the Sea Conference, and then it is up to the particular party to submit names. I am wondering, since there is a definite interest in this chamber in the Law of the Sea Conference, depending on the part of the country you come from, why, over the years, we have not been allocated, on a party basis, on both sides of the chamber, some sort of observer status. The meetings go on for eight or ten weeks.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator, of course, is aware that the general principle has been established. For example, Senator Williams has attended an international conference like the Law of the Sea Conference. Indeed, the Honourable Senator Williams has attended a number of international fisheries conferences. I am not aware, however, that as a standard practice the Senate has been granted the right to designate observers for all international conferences. Certainly, I have not been contacted to provide names from the government side to participate in Law of the Sea meetings. I think the honourable senator's suggestion is a very interesting and useful one, however.

Senator Marshall: Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate inquire and see if arrangements can be made for the Senate to have seats as observers at this conference?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the inquiry will certainly go forward. I know the Honourable Senator Marshall's interest and expertise in this area. I think that it could be very useful to have observers from the Senate at the Law of the Sea meetings.

ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON—IMPLICATIONS OF 200-MILE LIMIT

Hon. Jack Marshall: I have another question which arises out of the problems that exist now over the East Coast Fisheries Treaty. Certainly, the government is aware of the fact that there is another potential problem regarding reciprocal treaties between countries, and that has to do with the 200-mile limit and its implications for the little islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. I note that negotiations have been going on between Canada and France for many years, but we never hear of their progress. It is obvious that St. Pierre and Miquelon could extend their limit to 200 miles, which would certainly conflict with Canada's boundaries and the minerals and fish lying within them.

Could the Leader of the Government make an inquiry of the Department of External Affairs and prepare a statement on the present status of the negotiations with France and/or St. Pierre and Miquelon with regard to the median lines between the two countries and any plans for future negotiations, which indeed go into the implications of the Law of the Sea as to minerals and the ocean seabed?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no updated information on the situation. The last round of negotiations on maritime boundary delimitation between Canada and France concerning St. Pierre and Miquelon took place in January 1979. Negotiations will resume this year, and I can inform the honourable senator that it appears as though those talks will resume in May, so there will be another round of bargaining at that time.

Given the complexity of these negotiations and the fact that they are about to resume, it would be inappropriate at this stage to discuss the details of the negotiations, including the respective legal positions, or to comment beyond that on the press reports which appear from time to time.

As far as the alleged resources around St. Pierre and Miquelon are concerned, exploration is neither taking place nor is likely to occur until an agreement is reached on the delimitation of the maritime boundary between France and Canada. However, the discussions will resume tentatively, at least, in May.

MULTICULTURALISM

EXPENDITURES ON ADVERTISING

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, in honour of St. Patrick's Day I would like to ask a question in the area of multiculturalism. Like the Irish, the Scots are now called, under the new jargon, "non-visible ethnics." Heretofore I thought that I belonged to an impecunious minority, but the status is "non-visible ethnic."

The other day I was impressed and appalled to note that the Minister of State for Multiculturalism had reported that spending on advertising alone in the information budget would reach $60 million for this fiscal year, an increase of $10 million over what was forecast; and that the total information budget for the government, which had been forecast at $111.9 million, would reach $204.1 million in the next fiscal year and would escalate to $225.2 million in the following fiscal year.

In the light of these statistics, which are fearful altogether, can the minister indicate whether there is some reason for such an enormous and frightening escalation? Is the hard sell becoming ever harder? Is it more difficult to convince the Canadian public of the benevolence of their government? Or is it a fact that the whole thing requires, as is hinted in a recent article in the Globe and Mail, more careful study as to what in fact has been done in this super-salesmanship job which is costing the public so many, many dollars?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have great respect for the Honourable Senator Macquarrie's judgment and eloquence in this chamber. However, surely one cannot argue, on the one hand, for greater freedom of information and a greater need for the government actions and, on the other hand, when the government responds positively to the suggestions to communicate its actions while at the same time protesting, as the honourable senator has just done, when the government responds positively to suggestions that it communicate more effectively opposition critics speak of "freedom of information" and the need to keep the people of Canada well informed about government activities, yet they proceed to criticize those efforts, alleging that they are too costly. Of course, communications costs are increasing, but the government feels that it has a responsibility to provide as much information as possible about the various programs approved by Parliament. As my colleague, Senator Frith, has just observed, it is necessary to use modern communications techniques in the process. Extensive communications programs of various types have been adopted in most of the provinces, including, for example, the Province of Ontario. Radio, television and print advertising describing a wide range of provincial activities, are presented by all of the provinces, including Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. As a proportion of total provincial budgets, I suggest that the cost of these provincial programs is far in excess of the national government's publicity expenditures. A well-informed public is a more aware public, in the view of the national government.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—PRODUCTION OF IRISH MOSS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): While I am on my feet, and cognizant of the fact that it is St. Patrick's Day, may I furnish further information about Irish moss?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: I appreciate the fact that the Minister of Supply and Services for Canada has met the target date of March 17 with this information. I have discussed with my colleague the lack of information which has been available on this subject, and I have received a communication in response to the request for more details concerning the reply which Statistics Canada provided to Question No. 12 on the Order Paper raised by Senator Macquarrie. Statistics Canada have informed me, in a letter written by the Honourable Jean-Jacques Blais, as follows:

> 1. A similar question was submitted on April 3rd, 1978. The reply submitted by Statistics Canada stated that insofar as Statistics Canada was concerned, the information concerning the value and tonnage of Irish Moss produced in the Atlantic Provinces was confidential. This reply conforms with the reply recently tabled to Senate Question number 12.
> However, the reply tabled on October 10th, 1978 provided information obtained from other sources, namely the Departments of Fisheries and the Environment and Industry, Trade and Commerce.
>
> 2. The information requested, if provided, would make it possible to relate the particulars to an individual identifiable organization. This information is, therefore, not allowed to be disclosed under the Statistics Act.
>
> 3. In reference to the point raised by Senator Godfrey in the Senate on Wednesday February 25th, 1981, who stated
>
> > "... (Senator Perrault should) also draw to the attention of the bureaucrat responsible, the letter from the Prime Minister, which told bureaucrats that, until the Access to Information Bill became law, they should act as if it were law", > it must be pointed out that the proposed Access to Information legislation does not allow disclosure of information where privacy is protected by another Act of Parliament.
>
> In conclusion, it is clear that Statistics Canada has maintained the same position as that taken in 1978, which is that the confidentiality clauses of the Statistics Act preclude the release of any information concerning the value of tonnage of Irish Moss produced in the Atlantic Provinces.

I do not know whether that reply will assist the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, but an effort was made to obtain at least an explanation.

• (1440)

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I think I am entitled to observe that this St. Patrick's Day is a good day for all of us in more ways than one. It has shown the Honourable Senator Perrault at his humourous best. I cannot see how anyone could—and I appreciate the noted occasion of the day—bring in that question on Irish moss, which took nine months to get no information on, to say, "The reason why we have this $111 million budget is that we are giving people information all the time." I do not think he could have hit upon a worse indication of how well things are going. These costly millions are not, in fact, providing the information which the provinces would give any of these high-priced propagandists for nothing. I am not convinced that a province is such a confidentially-surrounded unit of business that that must be denied.

I would say that whoever came up with that second answer did not earn his share of that $111 million, any more than did the misanthropic, uninformed person who gave the earlier answer. All I will salute is the honourable leader's sense of humour and his effort to do his part dealing with a group of people who, while they may be very well paid, are not by any means very sensitive to the kinds of things which are of real importance to the people of this country.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I think it can be said that in the process of gathering information from a number of sources across the country and in asking companies for confidential information, if some of those companies conclude that that material will be used publicly and the source of the information will be identified, they may be quite reluctant to participate in the rather extensive information-gathering process engaged in by the government in recent years.

I think the honourable senator is aware that there could well be great reluctance on the part of many companies to provide confidential information, if there is any possibility that it could be used to their competitive disadvantage at some point in time. That is the nature of the problem I think we are facing here.

I believe in a free and open government and in access to information, but the difficulty which I have cited most certainly exists.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I will certainly not take up the time of this house arguing the point, but I do not know what I can do, or what branch of the government I can call on, to get across my message that I am not asking about individual companies but about provinces. Why is there this constant barrage: "We cannot open the books of companies"? I do not want to see them. I want to see how the industry is developing in the four Atlantic provinces.

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE—FINANCING OF UNITED STATES SECTION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, Senator Austin asked if President Reagan or any of his officials had indicated that they were "prepared to change, or to propose a change to, the existing legislation in order to allow the producers in Alaska to participate as equity holders in the financing of the United States portion of that pipeline."

May I say in reply that in his statement to the press on March 11, 1981, Secretary Haig stated:

> "What we reiterated was the American assurance that we are going to seek as soon as possible the completion of the U.S. segment of this pipeline through private financing and that's a reassurance and a restatement of our earlier assurances in this area. . . . We are going to do all within our power to see that it is available."

I understand from Secretary Haig's statement that the Reagan administration is prepared to do as much as the Carter administration in seeing this project completed, including the introduction of a legislative amendment to permit producers to have equity participation in the pipeline, if this is necessary to secure private financing.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO CHRYSLER CORPORATION—AMENDED AND RESTATED LOAN INSURANCE AGREEMENT

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, might I inquire of the Minister of State for Economic Development when he expects to be in a position to respond to my question to him of February 24 concerning the Chrysler loan?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I shall inquire into the matter and give the honourable senator a reply tomorrow. Hopefully, it will be a reply to the question, but if it is not ready I will at least try to respond to the question that was asked today.

TRANSPORT

AIRLINES—SALE OF NORDAIR

Hon. Martial Asselin: On March 2 I asked Senator Perrault a question regarding the sale of Nordair to Regionair. At that time the minister said that he would try to bring a statement to the Senate. Will the minister be doing that today or later this week?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, any supplementary information which may be available has not yet been received by me. Another inquiry will go forward today to find out whether further information can be brought to the chamber this week. Certainly, we shall aim to have something for the honourable senator tomorrow, if he requires that further information.

[Later:]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I seek leave of the house to revert very briefly to Question Period on a point of clarification.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: Earlier today Senator Asselin asked a question with respect to Nordair and asked for further information on that subject. I did make a statement about Nordair on March 12, at page 2031 of Senate Hansard. I presume he seeks information in addition to that which I gave in my reply. It was a fairly detailed reply, and I would not wish to obtain additional information if the data required by Senator Asselin is included in that reply.

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I am sorry I did not look at the answer Senator Perrault gave on March 12. I will do so, and if I need further information, I will let him know.

JUDGES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-34, to amend the Judges Act and certain other acts in consequence thereof.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, before proceeding with the third reading of this bill, I merely wish to make a very brief comment on the bill which, in my opinion, is important. In this way I will not be unduly delaying its passage. However, in view of the fact that it has been on the order paper for such a long time, and that it was also considered under the previous government, it is absolutely essential that the judges be granted the increase provided in the bill.

Unfortunately I did not have time to attend the meetings of the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs which studied the bill. However what surprised me, and what is also a source of concern for the judges, is the fact that in this legislation amendments are made to the provisions concerning the judges' contribution to pension in anticipation of their retirement or their death.

Senator Flynn dealt briefly with the matter when he spoke to the bill on second reading. Senator Frith touched lightly on it too. But there is the matter of the second class of judges that was created by the previous bill, which the minister is now attempting to do away with, by allowing or requesting that a number of judges contribute while others are not required to do so.

I must say that the situation causes some uneasiness among the members of the judiciary.

The minister, while the bill was being studied in committee at the other place, decided to withdraw that part of the legislation and to have this important matter looked into further, possibly by a committee of experts. I did not notice how that committee would be established but I should like to know whether or not Senator Frith can tell us just what direction his inquiry will take, and whether he will be presenting a report to Parliament in the near future with a view to remedying the situation that existed previously. Throughout that whole period, some judges had to make contributions with their own money in anticipation of their retirement or their death. Will those payments be interrupted until such time as the committee now studying the matter brings in a report?

If we allow this situation to continue to prevail for a year or more in the judiciary, where judges are paying that contribution, I am afraid the present uneasiness will grow.

I feel that the minister should stop these contributions until such time as the committee now examining the legislation reports to Parliament.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, without wanting to close the debate but merely in an attempt to answer the question put by Senator Asselin, I should like to mention, as a sort of preamble, that if I understand the situation correctly with regard to pensions, the matter is implied in the legislation now before us. It is mainly by implication that we are now dealing with this matter.

First of all, the question of contributions. If I correctly size up the present situation we are not in a position to stop temporarily the contributions owing to the fact that in the act as it now exists the differences to which Senator Asselin has alluded can be found.

As I said in the debate on second reading I think that those aspects are more harmful and worse—if that is possible—than the situation as it relates to salaries. Both are similar, that is for sure.

In my opinion anyway, the current situation with regard to pensions is totally unacceptable.

Second, if I fully appreciate the position of the government, there has been strong opposition in the other place; I would rather not mention a party, but I think it was the New Democratic Party—but aside from that there was opposition to that aspect of the bill. That is how I see the position of the government which is giving full support to the aspect of pensions and that in turn was the position of Senator Flynn when he was holding the justice portfolio. According to the information I have the government intends to continue supporting the position taken by Senator Flynn.

So as not to delay one aspect of the bill which has gained general support, they have accepted—not decided, but accepted, rather, under pressure—that the bill be split to settle the issue of salaries and postpone the other aspect for the time being.

This brings me to the third point, the intervention of Senator Asselin which, in my opinion, was an appropriate question to raise. How long would it take to settle the issue which was being studied at the same time as the other aspect? It is hoped, and I, for one, certainly hope that the whole thing will not be postponed for a year or more. Finally, I share Asselin's concern when he asks: "What can be done that has not already been done?"

I regret that I cannot come up with a satisfactory answer for Senator Asselin or for myself. But in the meantime, as a final remark I would say that we must accept that aspect of the bill. As for me, I promise to continue my efforts to settle the question of pensions. Senator Asselin and myself and, I believe, a number of other senators and many other Canadians, are determined that this harmful problem must be solved.

● (1500)

[English]

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, on March 11 Senator Frith moved the second reading of this bill. The usual practice in this house, unless there is some urgency, is for an opposition senator to adjourn the debate after the mover's speech. This serves the useful purpose of allowing senators to ponder, for at least 24 hours, the merits of the bill before deciding whether they want to speak on it or how they want to vote.

Senator Lawson happened that day to be making one of his infrequent, lightning-like descents on the Senate—here today and usually gone before tomorrow. Senator Lawson only graced this chamber with his presence on nine different occasions last year and, as we all know, he is not a member of any committee. No wonder, then, that he is evidently unfamiliar with, or at least rusty on, the most elementary procedures of this chamber. He tried to speak before Senator Frith had spoken after moving second reading. He then tried to speak before Senator Frith had finished and was still on his feet, apparently unaware that a senator has the floor, when he is speaking, until he sits down.

I thought it would be of some benefit to Senator Lawson if he had to stay around a second day to refresh himself as to the Senate's procedures, after all these years. I decided, therefore, to adjourn the debate before Senator Lawson could speak.

Senator Frith asked for speedy and non-partisan passage of this bill. He stated:

> —some of the mechanics are matters which honourable senators may wish to study and raise questions about in committee.

There was no indication whatsoever from Senator Frith, during his speech, that he wanted the debate on second reading completed that afternoon so that the committee could begin studying the bill the next morning. When he pointed that out and asked me to withdraw my motion to adjourn the debate, I did so.

The next morning, at the beginning of the proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs concerning this bill, I raised an objection to the way this bill was being rushed through without senators being given a chance to study "some of the mechanics" so that they could raise questions in committee. I asked that the committee members not complete their consideration of the bill that morning, but that they adjourn after hearing the evidence of officials from the department so that any honourable senator could have a chance to study the bill and raise questions if he so desired. Furthermore, it would give any member of the public, who wished to do so, a chance to appear before the committee. I fully appreciated that it would be most unlikely that questions would be raised or that a member of the public would want to intervene.

However, as the provisions for raising judges' salaries would be retroactive, I could not see what all the rush was about. The answer of the chairman of the committee, Senator Goldenberg, to that was to the effect that the government considered it a matter of urgency and wanted the bill to be rushed through, and that, apparently, was the only reason he needed. While the government's wishes may be all important to Senator Goldenberg, they certainly are not to me.

I felt that the desire of the government for speedy passage, in itself, was irrelevant unless it could give some valid reason for it. The reason given by the officials as to why the passage of the bill could not be delayed for several days was so feeble that I will not bother to mention it.

The committee sat for little over an hour and reported the bill without amendment.

I was then informed that Senator Frith wanted to have third reading that afternoon. This could only be done by the Senate unanimously waiving the rules that require one day's notice for third reading. When I inquired from Senator Frith what the rush was all about, I was simply informed that royal assent had been arranged for that afternoon.

That did not seem to me to be a valid reason either, and I therefore refused unanimous consent for the waiving of the rules and decided to use the debate on third reading to say a few words on the desirability of this body following procedures established over many years, after much thought and experience, and for fairly obvious reasons, unless there is good reason for making exceptions, which we do from time to time. I should say, in all fairness, that Senator Frith did amplify his reasons for wanting third reading that day, after I had refused to waive the rules.

May I remind honourable senators that I am Joint Chairman of the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments? A few of us meet once a week in splendid isolation. Most of the actual work in preparation for those meetings is done by our distinguished legal counsel, Mr. Graham Eglington. Much of his work is to examine the process and means by which the myriad of regulations are enacted by the government and to advise us when the process and means are irregular.

I would like to refer honourable senators to the fourth report of our committee this session, which we made last July and which is still under debate in this house.

In paragraph 10 of that report, we state:

> It is no exaggeration to say that the evolution of our constitutional system since Magna Carta has consisted of a series of controversies and conflicts over means. It is very easy for those responsible for fisheries policy or the protection of wildlife, or for those charged with rendering > manpower mobile, checking illegal work by immigrants, trying to reduce Post Office deficits or with protecting Canadian industries from overseas competition to come to see their policy objectives as all important, and to consider the means employed to achieve those objectives as subsidiary or even unimportant matters. While administrative efficacy may be the dominant objective of the administrative process, for the community as a whole, it is only one object and particularly when seen historically, not necessarily the most important one.

Honourable senators, departments of government frequently become very irritated with our committees when they are in pursuit of a very worthy object, and we object because they have not meticulously followed the proper procedure. I am willing to wager, however, that they are probably no more irritated than Senator Frith was with me last Thursday when I insisted that normal procedure be followed with respect to the passage of this bill, and that the procedural rules of this house not be waived. Senator Frith was following a very worthy object, namely, passage of this bill which had been unduly delayed in the House of Commons.

However, if Senator Frith is ever able to persuade me that following correct procedure is silly just because the object is worthy or would not affect the results, then I will quit as joint chairman and as a member of the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. I had better warn Senator Frith that he will have some difficulty in finding someone who will agree to take my place. While it is regarded as important, it is also regarded as a job involving a lot of dreary detail which no one else wants to take on. In the unlikely event that anyone is feeling sorry for me, I should hasten to say that I personally find the work rewarding because it is important.

Incidentally, in taking the position I did last Thursday that normal procedures be followed, I was considerably comforted by the fact that I was sure that judges, as a group, would understand and approve of my action. After all, they spend a great deal of their time making sure that proper procedures are followed before they arrive at their decision. We are all familiar with the expression "due process of law," and that is what it is all about. Justice must not just be done, but must be seen to be done by due process.

In conclusion, may I say that I regard this as an isolated case? Over the years, I have always admired the way Senator Flynn has insisted that the rules not be waived in the passage of legislation, unless there is some good reason for it. This means that, ordinarily, senators do have a chance to look at a bill and make a contribution to the debate or the proceedings in committee, if they wish to do so. It also ensures that the public are given a reasonable opportunity to ask to be heard at the committee stage or to make representations to senators.

Because Senator Flynn was the original sponsor of this bill, when he was Minister of Justice, he was evidently somewhat biased in favour of permitting the Deputy Leader of the Government to get the consent of the Senate to waive its rules. I am handing back to Senator Flynn, with complete confidence, the job of making sure that our rules are not waived in the future when there is no justification for doing so. Of course, if there is another bill still lurking in the House of Commons which Senator Flynn originally sponsored as Minister of Justice, then I will be prepared, once more, to fill his shoes on a temporary basis to make sure that the usual and proper procedure is followed when it reaches the Senate.

Incidentally, I am happy to say that I completely support the bill, and I trust that it will receive speedy passage in this chamber today.

[Senator Godfrey.]

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise, briefly, to support the position taken by Senator Godfrey. I would suggest that those who have the responsibility for the order of proceeding in this house pay more attention to rule 3 than they have been doing recently. Rule 3 reads:

> Notwithstanding anything in these rules, any rule or part thereof may be suspended without notice by leave of the Senate, the rule or part thereof proposed to be suspended, and the reason for the proposed suspension, being distinctly stated.

Some honourable senators will remember that it was on my initiative, after about three or four years of complaint, that it was finally decided, by those who have the responsibility for the management of the proceedings in the Senate, to at least state the rule or part thereof. We have now included the phrase "Notwithstanding rule . . ." and the rule is identified. It took about three years to persuade the management of the Senate to adopt that.

I had hoped, at the same time, that they would adopt the second part, that is, the reason for the proposed suspension being distinctly stated. That practice was followed for about a month, and then it was dropped. I believe there are understandable reasons why that might be regarded as onerous, because often the reasons for requesting leave are very obvious. The point made by Senator Godfrey, I think, is important. Honourable senators should know why leave is being asked for, because that is the point of the rule that the reason for asking for leave be clearly stated. There is nothing too onerous in that, I think, and I can understand that the omission on the part of the Leader of the Government or the deputy leader may be because they themselves are fully aware of the reasons and they assume that everyone else knows them. They have the task of preparing each day's proceedings, and so the reasons are familiar to them.

● (1510)

I was delighted when Senator Godfrey took the position he did, remembering some of the background of that particular bill and another bill, indeed, where something of the same sort happened where honourable senators were not aware of what had been going on in the corridors or behind doors. Therefore, I suggest, again, with respect—because I know the problems that the Leader of the Government and the deputy leader have—that they consider more carefully the information role that is assumed in rule 3.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank both Senator Godfrey and Senator Grosart for contributing to my on-the-job training, but in this particular case, apart from the general observations they have made, which I support, they forgot that I did try to explain my position. As a matter of fact, when Senator Godfrey explained why he refused leave, and I started to explain why I was asking for leave, I was called, I thought, to order. Anyway, I did continue and gave the explanation. In any event, so as not to prolong the matter any further, although Senator Godfrey and I are obviously unrepentant, we have used the opportunity to consider the whole question of the rules, and the question of asking for leave. As Senator Grosart has very usefully drawn to our attention, any one of us who asks for leave to suspend the rule can fall into that trap, namely, that everybody knows why it is being asked for. So he makes a very worthwhile suggestion; that when we are asking for leave to suspend the rules we be very clear in explaining to honourable senators why we are doing so, and we do not assume that everybody in the chamber knows.

In this case, at least it is on the record as to why we did ask for leave, and that question is now a bit passé since notice was then given and we are now faced with third reading. I have nothing further to add at this stage, and I ask that the bill receive third reading now, pursuant to due notice given.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADA STUDENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from March 12 the debate on the motion of Senator Riley for the second reading of Bill C-55, to amend the Canada Student Loans Act.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, in rising to take part in this debate, on behalf of this side of the house, I wish to compliment Senator Riley on his very good presentation of Bill C-55, an act to amend the Canada Student Loans Act. He explained to us that it was a non-controversial bill. Based on the experience we had in this chamber when a bill was presented and tagged as a "simple" bill, and then the debate lasted for days, I would not go so far as to say that it is a simple bill.

The sponsor of the bill expressed his desire, and the desire of the department, to put this bill through the Senate without too much delay. In reading Hansard of the other place, I noticed that after the Honourable Francis Fox, the Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of Communications, introduced the bill, only two spoke on it, one from each party.

On Thursday I said that in preparing my comments today I would consider the views expressed by the sponsor of the bill and Senator Buckwold. Senator Buckwold expressed his concern regarding many abuses in the past, and said that machinery should be found by which to have a greater number of students reimburse their loans.

A member of the other place suggested that one way to control those abuses was a means test. I do not agree with a means test, and I am sure that it was not in the mind of Senator Buckwold either. I personally feel that a means test should not be applicable at any stage of the student loan, based on the experience that we have had with means tests in the Department of National Health and Welfare, where unlimited abuses have also been reported. I feel that if we impose a means test on students, we lack faith in their morals and confidence in their ability to honour their pledge. If there is a group of citizens we should trust, it is those who are willing to educate themselves and be our successors. Without a means test, it gives the students more flexibility and independence.

Senator Riley began his comments by outlining the purpose of the Canada Student Loans Act, which is to enable full-time post-secondary students in financial need to obtain loans to continue their education. The amount of the loan is determined by provincial authorities in accordance with minimum criteria agreed to by all participating governments. The loans are advanced by chartered banks and other designated lenders, such as credit unions. The Canadian government pays the interest charges on loans, while the students are enrolled in university, and for a six-month period thereafter. It also guarantees lenders against any loss under the program. Since the act was introduced in 1964, it has been amended only once, in 1970, although changes in loan limits have been effected twice by means of appropriations items.

● (1520)

According to Senator Riley, one of the most important changes contained in Bill C-55 arises from the need to accommodate the increase in the number of courses which are less than the traditional 26 weeks in length. These are now available to young people as a result of the rapid vocational institutes at the post-secondary level. The main effect of this bill is to allow students in community colleges to qualify for aid under the Canada Student Loans Act.

At the other end of the spectrum, the bill also provides for increased loans to students enrolled in courses longer than the traditional university academic year of 32 weeks, thus making it more practical for such students to continue their education without undue financial hardship.

The current legislation provides for a maximum loan of $1,800 in an academic year of at least 26 week's duration. The amendment proposes that loans be available to persons in periods of study of at least 12 weeks' duration. This amendment takes into consideration changes which have occurred in Canadian education patterns since the initial bill was introduced.

Bill C-55 also proposes that the loan limit of $1,800 be expressed on a weekly basis, thus relating the maximum amount of loan aid a student may receive to the length of his or her course and, therefore, to the costs. The proposed weekly loan limit of $56.25 amounts to $1,800 for a 32-week course, the traditional university course length in which the majority of students are enrolled.

Since the current legislation entitles students in 26- to 31-week courses, and in semesters of 13 to 15 weeks which form part of a longer course, to $1,800 and $900 respectively, it provides that such students remain eligible for loans up to these limits rather than the lesser amounts which would result if the $56.25 weekly limit were to be applied. This is particularly important in certain cases, notably those of students at Memorial University in Newfoundland.

It was argued that these two proposals will go some way toward meeting the financial needs of both those enrolled in colleges of applied arts and technology and similar institutions in courses between 12 and 26 weeks in length and those enrolled in courses longer than 32 weeks.

In concluding, he said the bill, while important, does not make sweeping changes at the moment. The changes are those essential to update the act in light of changing course patterns.

In addition to these modifications, the bill proposes several amendments of a housekeeping nature. First, it proposes dropping the current requirement for a 12-month waiting period before applications may be accepted from those with permanent resident status. The Immigration Act of 1977 no longer permits a student to convert student visa status to permanent resident status while in Canada. Hence, the need for the waiting period is no longer relevant and it has been removed.

The bill also proposed inclusion of specific authority for the Governor in Council to make regulations respecting the denial of further assistance to those deliberately abusing the program. It also includes authorization for the Governor in Council to make regulations restricting payments to banks under the guarantee where a bank has failed, without cause, to submit claims for loss promptly, thus avoiding unnecessary accumulation of interest charges against the student borrower. The bill provides for a change in the minister responsible, consequent upon the transfer of the program from the Department of Finance to the Department of the Secretary of State.

Finally, the bill includes the alteration of the loan year start date from July 1 to August 1 to coincide with the banking fiscal year, thereby facilitating interest payments to lenders.

In speaking for the opposition, I would say that these amendments are long overdue. I may add that many of them do not go far enough. The assessment process for granting loans should be universal, with all provinces adhering to the same criteria.

I feel that the government should have a mechanism to monitor the standards of foreign universities when Canadian students use these loans to attend such institutions. If the provinces are not equipped to do this, the federal government should take the responsibility to do so.

Honourable senators, what I have in mind is that when a loan is made to a foreign university, the latter should have a certain standard of criteria acceptable to Canadian universities, so that when the student comes back to Canada, either to continue or further his education, the credit that he has earned there could be applied toward his obtaining a Canadian diploma or degree.

[Senator Bélisle.]

I welcome the change in eligible course length under the program, but note that it still does not include apprenticeship programs, where a person will receive on-the-job training. We all know that in this day and age we need to train our students, our workers, and all those who are willing to learn, new methods and new technology. If we are to decrease our high rate of unemployment, then I would say to the minister that the apprenticeship programs should be part and parcel of this bill.
